Of the advances referred to, the first were made by Mr. Genet. These you will see in the printed correspondence between him and Mr. Jefferson. The former had, in his letter to the Secretary of State, the 17th of May, 1793, said that the Government that he was authorized to propose a treaty on a "liberal and fraternal basis." Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Morris, our minister at Paris, dated the 23d of August, 1793, assigns the reason for postponing the negotiation. "The Senate (says he) being then in recess, and not to meet again till the fall, I apprised Mr. Genet that the participation in matters of treaty, given by the minister of the United States, to the government of the United States, would of course delay any definitive answer to his friendly proposition. As he was sensible of this circumstance, the matter has been understood to lie over till the meeting of the Senate. Congress were not to meet until December; consequently there was no necessity of precipitating the business. But, with the best dispositions to form new commercial arrangements, mutually more beneficial to both nations, those of the treaty of 1778, the unadulterated conduct of Mr. Genet, from the moment he landed at Charleston, until the date of his letter on the subject of the negotiation, was sufficient to excite caution in the American Government. He had there violated the sovereignty of the United States, by authorizing the French on every occasion of their arrival in the port, every private vessel, and every French vessel, to cruise and commit hostilities on neutral vessels in the United States, and with whom we had extensive commercial connexions. "These privateers were taking and bringing prizes into our ports, and the consuls of France were assuming to hold courts of admiralty on them, to try, condemn, and authorize their sale as legal prize." Neutrality was the watchword, really and truly; yet a Frenchman, Mr. Genet, instructed the minister of the United States at Paris to manifest the same to the Executive of France, and to suggest for this purpose that the powers of Mr. Genet be renewed to his successor. It is true that, in his letter dated the 5th of September, Mr. Jefferson had made a new proposal for the Government to undertake a negotiation with that minister, after "the correspondence which had taken place between the Executive and him," (a correspondence on his part replete with insults) "and the acts which he had thought proper to do, and to countenance, in opposition to the laws of the land." After the Government had instructed our minister at Paris to inform Mr. Genet, and to declare to the Government of France the "necessity of their having a representative here disposed to respect the laws and authority of the country, and to do the best for their interest which these would permit; and when it was only an anxious regard for those interests, and a desire that they might not suffer, which induced the Executive, in the mean time, to shelve the business of establishing a commercial intercourse, and to be restrained within the limits of the law, as theretofore announced to him, or should be of the tenor usually observed towards independent nations by the representative of a friendly Power residing with them?" Under such circumstances what answer could the Executive give Mr. Genet, that the United States would, more upon the same principle, if possible for the Government to undertake a negotiation with that minister, after "the correspondence which had taken place between the Executive and him," (a correspondence on his part replete with insults) "and the acts which he had thought proper to do, and to countenance, in opposition to the laws of the land." After the Government had instructed our minister at Paris to inform Mr. Genet, and to declare to the Government of France the "necessity of their having a representative here disposed to respect the laws and authority of the country, and to do the best for their interest which these would permit; and when it was only an anxious regard for those interests, and a desire that they might not suffer, which induced the Executive, in the mean time, to shelve the business of establishing a commercial intercourse, and to be restrained within the limits of the law, as theretofore announced to him, or should be of the tenor usually observed towards independent nations by the representative of a friendly Power residing with them?" Under such circumstances what answer could the Executive give Mr. Genet, that the United States would, more upon the same principle, if possible for the Government to undertake a negotiation with that minister, after "the correspondence which had taken place between the Executive and him," (a correspondence on his part replete with insults) "and the acts which he had thought proper to do, and to countenance, in opposition to the laws of the land.""

The President having afterwards assented, the Secretary on the same day delivered to Mr. Adet a printed copy of the treaty, on which he promised to communicate his remarks.

Mr. Adet, however, dated July 6th, refuting the objections they contained, I have already noticed. The subsequent proceedings will show, either that those objections did not make any strong impressions on Mr. Adet's mind, or that the Secretary's answer had removed them.

On the 30th June, 1795, Mr. Adet wrote to the President of his intention to conclude a new commercial treaty and such terms in convention as should be entered into between France and the United States. The instructions imparted to him was that he only be "with the American Government the means and arrangement" of these treaties, and then to communicate them to the Committee of Public Safety. The object of the new treaty was declared to be, to induce the respective Governments to make stipulations more reciprocally advantageous and more clearly worded than that of 1778, and the object of the consular convention to secure the execution of the commercial treaty.

The Secretary of State answered on the 1st of July, expressing the readiness of the Government to open the proposed negotiation, and requested a communication of the dates to which Mr. Adet's instruction referred.

On the 8th of July, 1795, Mr. Adet replied to the Secretary of State, "that he neither knew nor possessed any other decree, relating to the commerce of the United States, than the 5th of July 1778, communicated to us by citizen Genet." This letter of the 8th was received the 12th, accompanied by a note of the latter date, apologizing for the delay on account of sickness. On the 13th the Secretary of State had written to him, pressing him on the subject of the new negotiation.

On the 16th of July, 1795, the Secretary of State again wrote to Mr. Adet; and after informing him that, as he was not clothed with any very formal authority on this subject, the President of the United States had thought proper to place him (the Secretary of State) upon the same, and no other footing. The Secretary proposed that the negotiation should be conducted in writing, unless when either thought it expedient to have an interview on any particular difficulty. And then, assuring Mr. Adet that no unnecessary procrastination should be found in the Secretary of State, further proposed, that Mr. Adet should state, 1st. The parts of the treaty which he wished to be abolished; 3d. Those parts which he wished to be corrected; and, 3d. Any additions which seemed to him desirable; but expressed the readiness of the Secretary to adopt any other better mode of conducting the negotiation, if such occurred to Mr. Adet.

On the 20th of July, 1795, Mr. Adet, mentioning his sickness, which for fifteen days had obliged him to abstain from business, replied, on the subject of the negotiation, in these words: "In a few days I shall have the honor of sending you the agreements in order to commence the business relative to the digesting the new treaty and new consular convention.

From this detail it must, I conceive, be no easy task to find any facts by which Mr. Adet's charge can be supported. What he affects to call "frivolous pretexts," are substantial reasons and, in respect to his own advances to the commerce of the United States, the conduct of our Government, manifests an eagerness to enter on the negotiation; certainly, you will discover it in no disposition to elude or to procrastinate.

You will be pleased to observe, sir, that the letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, explaining the manner in which agreement was reached in the 16th of July, is this answer, agreeing shortly to meet the Secretary, in order to take the necessary measures for commencing the business, is dated the 20th of July: yet, in his note of November 12th, 1796, after having charged the Government of the United States with closing all advances made by the republic for renewing the treaties of commerce, and excusing itself on the ground that the Secretary of State had refused to meet the Secretary of France, and that the latter had explained the manner of proceeding, he asks, "But at what time? when the ratification of the treaty, concluded between Lord Grenville and Mr. Jay, no longer permitted the undersigned to pursue that negotiation."

I am sorry, sir, in this place, to call your attention to dates. The British treaty was not ratified till the 14th of August 1795. A parallel of negotiation, the paper which Mr. Adet had been proposed to him by the Secretary of State, and twenty-five days after he had agreed to proceed in it. And if that ratification finally induced him to abandon the idea of negotiating a new treaty between France and the United States, it did not instantly give this determination. He doubtless perceived that his own objections to the British treaty were overborne by the answer from the Secretary of State; and when he acknowledged the receipt of it, he had given up the right of judging of the treaty, whether it was good or bad. "I shall," says he, in his letter of July 29th, 1795, "transmit it (the Secretary's answer) to the French Government, together with my observations and the treaty. I will only honor the presence of my able minister, the Secretary of State, to judge of the whole. In short, I entrust myself to decide at all." And then immediately adds: "In a few days I shall have the honor of seeing you, and of taking the necessary measures in order to commence the business relative to the digesting the new treaty and new consular convention." The British treaty, then, did not obstruct the negotiation; the principles of which might be adopted, and the arm of that power, to be submitted to the respective Governments; for that was all the respective negotiators were authorized to do.

Will the ministers of the French republic never cease to reproach us with "ingratitude"? If, indeed, "France solicited not to enter into the Union of the United States, and if she was thereupon forced to the measure she might, as the price of that very independence, have granted them less liberal conditions," our obligations are greater than we have hitherto imagined. But it is time that these claims to our gratitude were investigated, and their extent ascertained. We have citizens yet alive, who were actors and witnesses of the declaration of our independence, and of the efforts to maintain it, with their effects, prior to our treaty with France. But laying no stress on our own recollections or consciousness, we will resort to the testimony of France herself.

France, by her minister the Marquis de Noailles, having, in the declaration of the 13th of March, 1778, which I have already quoted, announced to the court of London the treaty of friendship and commerce she had formed with the United States, and that she would communicate its subjects to them, he which was then understood that France

His Most Christian Majesty had "taken eventual measures, in concert with the United States of North America," that court published a justificative memorial, to vindicate to the world the war she had determined to wage against England. This memorial was published in the Jacobinist and the Public Universalist, and every republican prayer was that the war should succeed. The news of this unexpected disaster, which arrived in Europe in November, 1777, astonished the British ministers, and must have the more sensibly affected them, as it overthrew the plan they had laid for the reduction of the colonies. On these observations they in the British cabinet, the idea of conciliation with America, and of a coalition against the Courts of France, in regard to the commerce of the United States; and to gratify "their most dear and constant wish—that of humbling France." "It was natural for the British ministry, unable to subdue her colonies, to seek to be reconciled to them, and to engage them on the same terms on which they had already the other more effectually to destroy than to subdue. In this manner was the proceedings of France, with regard to American privateers, and, especially, the dislike the King had at all times manifested to any engagement with the Congress, must have given disgust and dissatisfaction to their deputies, and influenced the British Cabinet in understanding their well known aversion, to seek, even in England, the safety of their country, when they failed to find it in France."

"The King, well informed of the plan of the court of London, and of the preparations which were the consequance of it, permitted that so much time was to be lost, if he would prevent the designs of his enemies: His Majesty, therefore, to take into his consideration, as long as the Senators of the Congress.*

* The commissioners from the United States proposed to the King a treaty of amity and commerce, and an alliance, offensive and defensive, by which His Majesty should engage, not only to acknowledge simply and purely the independence of the United States, but also to guaranty and defend it by force of arms. The King ordered an answering commission to be prepared; he could not, he insisted, upon the principle, that it did not belong to him to acknowledge it, because he had not any right to judge of it; neither could he guaranty it, as he did not intend to enter into a war for its support. His Majesty, in consequence, refused an offensive alliance, and the question of a defensive alliance only was considered. King George, in a letter to Mr. Adams, written in December, 1777, had formed the design of attacking France. His Majesty thought he ought to enter into an alliance with the United States, eventual and purely defensive. The stipulations contained in this second treaty are, in substance, that, if France should be attacked by the court of London, before the cessation of hostilities between that court and its allies, then the United States should declare war against France. That the King should guaranty the independence and sovereignty of the United States; and that he should not lay down his arms till it should be acknowledged by Great Britain.

Thus it is manifest that the king meant to increase the number of her enemies by attacking France, in which it would be as truly the interest of France as of the United States to make it a common cause. This last treaty remained secret, because it was not in force at the time of concluding it; but that of commerce was notified at the court of London, March 13, 1778. The first words of the notification are the

The United States of North America, who are in full possession of independence, &c. &c. The whole paragraph has already quoted. The notification further expressed "that the King, being determined to protect effectually the law-commerce of his subjects, and to maintain the dignity of his flag, His Majesty has, in consequence, taken eventumeasures, in concert with the United States of North America."
The court of London chose to consider this notification as a declaration of war, of which they accuse the King as being the author, and represent him as the vioator of laws divine and human, &c. &c. "The act, however, which has drawn upon the King such odious impu-rities, is, in fact, of two different sorts: the first, that the Americans had the public possession of their independ-ences, the second, that the King had the right to look upon this independence as existing, without being obliged to examine the legality of it, and that no law forbade him to to form connexions with the Americans."

It is manifest that the fruitless attempts of the colonies to obtain redress from their mother country, in the mode of supplication, had induced them to league together to maintain their privileges, sword in hand, and soon after to publish a treaty whereby they declared themselves independent, say, "This act, which is of the 4th of July, 1776, induced the court of London to give way to her resentment: she displayed her power to change it within a short time by equipping her fleets and by assaulting her colonies, but they did not serve to demonstrate to America, to all Europe, and to the court of London herself, her impotence, and the impossibility of her ever hereafter bringing the Americans again under her yoke!" That she had given this demonstration of her power, and that the court of London, in whose hands, lastly sent from the court of London to America, and communicated by Lord and General Howe. Congress were then uninformed of the treaties which their commissioners had lately concluded at Paris. Yet, confident in the strength and spirit of their country, and of the inability of Britain to subdue it, they resolved, unanimously, to reject these overtures for peace and conciliation, and to hold no conference or correspondence with any commissioners on the part of Great Britain, unless, as a preliminary, they withdrew their fleets and armies, or, in positive terms, acknowledged the independence of these States.

Again: It is sufficient for the justification of His Majesty, that the colonies, which form a nation considerable, as long as the number of their inhabitants, as for the extent of their dominion, have established their independence, not only by a solemn declaration, but also in fact; and that they have supported it against the efforts of their mother country. Such was, in effect, the situation of the United States, when the King began to negotiate with them. His Majesty had full liberty of considering them as independent, or as the subjects of Britain. He chose from the first part, because his safety, the interest of his people, invincible policy, and, above all, the secret projects of the court of London, imperiously laid him under the necessity.

The secret projects here referred to were those of reconciliation, on terms which might satisfy the United States, and produce a re-union and coalition, for the purpose of overcoming France. To avoid the danger, His Majesty considered, that the possibility of uniting again the great portions of the British empire, separated in fact, and thus essentially to diminish its power, were the avowed inducements, with the court of France, to consider the United States as independent. Having stated these things, they "ask if there is a sovereign who, in the same situation with His Majesty, would not have acted in the same manner."

Again: "He (the King of France) had the right to consider as independent the confederate inhabitants of an immense continent, who presented themselves to him with this character especially after their ancient sovereign had declared himself impotent, the barbarous French invasion having for its object, the utter extermination of the colony."

To complete the justification of His Majesty, nothing remains but to examine whether what are called reasons of State could have determined His Majesty to connect himself with the Americans. To treat this question with the clearest light of which it is susceptible, the political interests of France must be viewed under two different relations; the first respects the other Powers of Europe; the second respects Great Britain."

"In treating with the Americans, after they became independent, the King exercised the right inherent in his sovereignty, with no other view than to put an end to the predominant power which England abusing in every quarter of the globe.

The Observations then suggest, by this conduct, the King has essentially watched over the interest of all the sovereigns of Europe, "by contributing to restrain a power which has always carried to excess the abuse of her resources."

The court of London having charged the King of France with ambition, and the project of demolishing the power of Britain, "the American congresses, with the commissions of their observances, the measures which were adopted in them, [his engagements with the United States] on the most accurate scrutiny, than a diminution of this power—a diminution which England has herself provoked, by a conduct the most unjust and most irregular, and which the tranquillity and happiness of England have for a long time required."

and they have been deprived of numbers of their best and most courageous soldiers against the enterprises of such a power; so that, the only means of being secured from it, was to seize the opportunity of diminishing it."

"It may then be truly said, that, on examination of the conduct of the King, it was not only just and lawful, but absolutely necessary, as well for the individual interest of France, as for that of all Europe."

I will trouble you with but one more extract from the Justificatory Observations of the court of France.

"To receive the objections with regard to the real motives which have directed the conduct of the King, the British ministry maintain that he entered into treaty with the Americans, not because he feared the power of Great Britain. But he foreseen that the American independence, and without the resources, were about to return to their mother country; and that there was not a moment to be lost in reanimating and confirming them in their opposition. It was, without doubt, for the sake of this assertion, that the British ministry, in their declaration, lauded the sovereign right of the United States, as applying only to the inhabitants of the United States. That is, with greater truth, be said, that this research did not coincide with their plan of defence. The King is willing to spare the British ministry a task so disagreeable and embarrassing, by observing for them, that the conversations which led to the treaties of the 6th of February, 1778, were considerably posterior
FRANCE.

After these repeated declarations on the part of France that her only view, in contracting engagements with the United States, was to diminish the British power, and thereby promote the safety and interest of her own people and the tranquillity of Europe, very unexpected, indeed, are the modern claims of boundless and perpetual gratitude. Nevertheless, as we have always been, with sincere desires to maintain those useful and friendly connections with France which had their foundation in our Revolution, we should have remained silent on these claims, had not the frequency and manner in which they have been urged, compelled their discussion. We are not now disposed to question the importance of the aid actually derived from France in the war of our Revolution; nor to retract the grateful acknowledgments that all America has, from that time, offered to that nation; we were in the habit of expressing our gratitude to her for the benefits which we received, although they resulted from her exertions to advance her own interest and secure her own safety. But if those benefits had been rendered from liberal and good motives, it would have been the highest demonstration of magnanimity, constantly to upbraid the receivers of their favors with ingratitude? Do not such reproaches cancel the obligation? But if for favors, apparently generous, substantial returns are demanded, the supposed liberal act degenerates into a mere bargain.

In these motives for our gratitude towards France, at the commencement of her political and commercial connections with us, in the midst of our war with Great Britain, what more can we discover at the conclusion of that war? Let us examine.

In 1780, with the assistance of a French army by land, and a powerful fleet by sea, a second British army was captured.

This event made even the British Government desirous of bringing the United States again under her subjection. The ministry was changed; and the Parliament passed an act to authorize the King to make peace. In the summer of 1782, Mr. Oswald, an agent, on the part of France, to Paris, to negotiate with the government of the United States. For some time, Doctor Franklin and Mr. Jay were alone at Paris. The commission to Mr. Oswald (the British negotiator) authorized him to treat of and conclude a peace or truce with any commissioner or commissioners, named or to be named by the colonies or plantations of New Hampshire, &c., (naming the thirteen) or with any persons who might be appointed for the purpose. The commission to Mr. Oswald: the independence of the Thirteen States was no where intimated. Agreeably to their instructions from Congress, to take advice of the court of France, the commissioners communicated Mr. Oswald's intelligence to the Congress, and Mr. Oswald's commission was sufficiently that it was such a one as we might have expected it would be:— "that an acknowledgment of our independence, instead of precedent, must, in the natural course of things, be the effect of the treaty." This opinion the count continued, from time to time, to repeat. In short, "it was evident the count did not wish to see our independence acknowledged by Britain until they had made all their uses of it." Mr. Jay still remained unmoved. He conferred with Mr. Oswald, and "urged, in the strongest terms, the great impropriety and consequently the utter impossibility of our ever treating with Great Britain on any other than an equal footing; and told him plainly that he (Mr. Jay) would have no concern in any negotiation in which we were not considered as an independent nation."

It was on this occasion that Mr. Oswald communicated to Mr. Jay this article of his instructions: "In case you find the American commissioners are not at liberty to treat on any terms short of independence, you are to declare to them, in the name of the court of France, that it disposes of all its claims to the peace: and that, not treating with commissioners on any other footing than that of absolute independence; and proposed to give to him in writing what he had before expressed in conversation—his determination not to treat but on the footing of equality. Mr. Oswald preferred having it in writing. Mr. Jay prepared the draught of a letter, to be signed by him and Doctor Franklin, expressing their determination not to treat but on terms of equality, as an independent nation. Accordingly, Doctor Franklin wrote the draught of the letter to Mr. Oswald, and, therefore, rather imprudent: for that, in case Britain should remain firm, and future circumstances should compel us to submit to their mode of treating, we should do it with an ill grace, after such a decided and peremptory refusal; besides, the doctor seemed much pleased with the instructions from Congress, to be guided by the advice of the French court. Neither of these considerations affected Mr. Jay: for, as to the first, he could not conceive of any event which would render it proper, and therefore possible for America to treat in any other character than as an independent nation. And, as to the second, he could not believe that Congress intended they could execute their commands without some degree of dignity."

Doctor Franklin's doubts prevented this letter being signed. Mr. Oswald was disappointed, and desired to see the draught. He saw it, and requested a copy of it. After taking time for consideration, Mr. Jay complied with the request, and sent the draught to Mr. Oswald: some of the sentiments and opinions he wished omitted, and, if finally, they should not be content to treat with us as independent, they would never offer us peace or treaty with us. Besides, he could not be persuaded that Great Britain, after what the House of Commons had declared; after various other acts of that Government, manifesting the intention to acknowledge it; would persist in refraining from acknowledging our independence, and that they really believed that we had firmly resolved not to treat on more humble terms."

"With the copy of this draught Mr. Jay gave Mr. Oswald copies of the various resolutions of Congress which enhanced their adherence to their independence. These papers Mr. Oswald sent by express to London, and warmly recommended for the making of a new commission, to have now, all delay.

Observations, pages 95, 96.
Mr. Jay having afterwards ascertained that the Count de Vergennes had sent a confidential agent to London, but whose journey was intended to have been a secret, for purposes evidently hostile to the interests of the United States, determined immediately to counteract the project, by an agent on whom he could rely, to make to the court of London such representations as he thought the occasion demanded. He succeeded in and in about two weeks, Mr. Oswald, a minister of the crown, arrived in London, for which Mr. Jay had determined.

Mr. Jay remarked, that, agreeably to the declaration of independence, the United States, as free and independent, had full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, &c. That, by the act of confederation, the style of the confederacy was declared to be, the United States of America, and by that act Congress were vested with the sole and exclusive right of injuring or of being of right and in fact free and independent States, their Representatives in Congress granted a commission to certain gentlemen, of whom Dr. Franklin and he were two, in their name to confer, treat, and conclude, with ambassadors, envoys extraordinary and plenipotentiary, on such terms and for such purposes as Congress should direct. They would have been, not independent citizens, but, by our acknowledgment, British subjects! Mr. Jay would not consent to this degradation, after we had maintained our independence six years, after we had established it in fact, and after Congress had, by firm and repeated resolutions, refused to treat with Great Britain, unless, as a preliminary, and there were not the persons with whom Mr. Oswald was authorized to treat. And if the commissioners had consented to treat with Mr. Oswald under such a commission, what would have been the condition of the people of the United States in the interest of the confederation in the hands of the government? They would have been, not independent citizens, but, by our acknowledgment, British subjects!

The at same time Congress manifested their readiness to attend to such terms of peace as might consist with the honor of independent nations but the honor of an independent nation forbade their treating in an undependent capacity. Even the Dutch, who had been treated with as an independent nation, required that we should not degrade ourselves when going to treat with our enemy. And why, then, should her ministers desire us to do it? Especially when the treaty of defensive alliance declared the "essential and direct end of it was to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States; and the United States, as governments, were independent of each other. And Mr. Oswald, and the United States, engaged not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States should be attained. The explicit acknowledgment of their independence by Great Britain would show that, for the essential and direct ends of that treaty, there was no necessity of continuing the war. But, since making this treaty of alliance, Mr. Jay found that other countries, and whose sake we were not bound to postpone the offered peace. We have seen the explicit avowal of the King of Spain, that he entered into a treaty with the United States with the view to promote the safety and interest of his kingdom. Thus the object of England and France: the independence of Great Britain, it became apparent that there would be no objection to our dependence on France, particularly in "leaving the King master of the terms of the treaty of peace." And to keep us thus far dependent, was manifestly a breach of certain measures of the French court, calculated to deprive the United States of an immense western territory, of the navigation of the Mississippi, and of the fisheries, except on our own coast. A combination of facts and circumstances leave no doubt of the intentions of the French court, as to the objects above mentioned. I cannot undertake the lengthy detail, and will only just mention, in regard to territory, what was hotly urged by Mr. Jay, that the treaty of navigation should not be signed, without the express consent of his own sentiments, or that he was not acting by the direction of the French court. He proposed what he called a conciliatory line between the United States and Spain. This was to begin at the division of East from West Florida, and run thence to Fort Toulouse on the river Alabama, thence by different courses to Cumberland river, and down the Mississippi to New Orleans. It was nothing more than the natural line, that," as to the course and navigation of the Mississippi, they followed the property, and would belong, therefore, to the nation, to which the two banks belonged: the United States could have no pretensions, not being masters of either border of the river;" and that," as to what respects the lands situated to the northward of the Ohio, therefore, we say that Spain did not admit them to our pretensions to that coast; indeed, Spain has a claim of Lima, and Peru, or of London." It is certain that, originally, Spain made no pretensions to any lands eastward of the Mississippi to the northward of the Floridas and it is clear that the idea of her finally making the claim, was suggested by the court of France.

We are now prepared to understand the declarations made in the instructions to citizen Genet, minister plenipotentiary from the French republic to the United States. These instructions are dated the 16th of January, 1783, and were published in December of that year, in Philadelphia, by Mr. Genet, in vindication of his extraordinary mission. They declared our Government to be desirous of a "peace, friendly, and advantageous to us, a peace capable of being maintained." They also feared that the establishment of a confederacy for America, and have seen in them, with indignation, that, at the very time the good people of America expressed their gratitude to us in the most feeling manner, and gave us every proof of their friendship, Vergennes and Montmorin thought it necessary to act as missionaries to the United States, and to promote the French interests. The reason given by Mr. Jay for this affectation was, because we would soon acquire a strength which it was probable they would be eager to abuse." The same Machiavellian principle influenced the operations of the war for independence: the same duplicity reigned over the new-born nations of Europe.

We see, then, that, in forming connexion with us in 1778, the court of France, the actual organ of the nation, had no regard to the interest of the United States but that their real object was, by seizing the occasion of dismembering the British empire, to diminish the power of a formidable rival and that, when, after we had carried on a distressing war for seven years, the great object for which we had contended, independence, was within our reach, that court endeavored to postpone the acknowledgment of it by Great Britain, and eventually to deprive us of its fairest fruits—a just extent of territory, the navigation of the Mississippi, and the fisheries.

Such being the motives and conduct of France, what insinuations of truly partial sentiments towards that nation? Thus, as Mr. Oswald informed us, the American ministers to France were engaged in a common cause against Great Britain. We received loans of money; we were aided by troops and ships in attacking and conquering the common enemy, in the bosom of our country; and this association in war produced acquaintances and personal friends. Having experienced these benefits, we gave way to our feelings, without inquiring into the motives from which they were rendered.

But why are we so often reminded of the debt of gratitude? Is it really because more than gratitude, because compensation is expected to cancel it? If compensation is the object, the treaty of alliance has resolved the claim.

"The declarations of parties declare that, being resolved to fulfill, each on its own part, the clauses and conditions of the present treaty of alliance, according to its own power and circumstances, there shall be no offer of claim of compensation, on one side or the other, whatever may be the event of the war." You would not be without a principle to guide you in accordance with the charge of the Congress, that we have not offered to France the success which friendship might have given, without compromising the Government.

If Mr. Adet had specified the kind of succors which might thus have been offered, we could better judge of the correctness of his assertion.

If the United States were not rendered no succors to France? Read the following passages in the Secretary of State's letter of the 16th of August, 1783, to Mr. Morris. "We recollect with satisfaction, that, in the course of two years, by unceasing exertions, we paid up seven years' arcarages and instalments of our debt to France, which the inefficacy of our representation of the foreign government had suffered to be accomplished, that pressing attention. We have still to remember that, the efforts of our engagements, we have facilitated to Mr. Genet the effect of the representations of the present year, to enable him to send relief to his fellow-citizens in France, threatened with famine, that in the first moment of the insurrection which threatened the colony of St. Domingo, we stepped forward to their relief with arms and money, taking freely on ourselves the risk of an unauthorized aid, and when delay would have been demoralizing, that we have given the exand had referred to the British, our knowledge of them would have been some guide in forming our opinion of the threatened captures by the French; but the operation of the decree was to remain in force to the last day of the year, and these shall suffer to be treated by the English. As this could not be ascertained beforehand, we wished to know what was the cause of these vessels, then exercised by the British Government, were considered as of a nature to justify a denial of those rights which were pledged to us by our treaty with France. Whether the orders had actually been given to capture the vessels of the United States, as Mr. Adet, in his reply, says, that I appear not to have understood either the decree of the directory, or his note which accompanied it. The meaning of the decree is certainly not very obvious. The manner of executing it was declared to depend on a contingency—what French cruisers in the four quarters of the world to determine what was the conduct of the English at any given time? It could have furnished a copy of the orders actually given to French armed vessels, under the decree, we might have seen clearly what were the intentions of the direction. If we are to take the practice of the French armed vessels and of some of the French tribunals, as the true illustration of the English action, we may deduce that the decree was to be treated as if it were an order to the French to seize, in a contrary manner, any English (or other enemy's) property on board American vessels, and the seizure of all our vessels in our neutral port, and in our neutral sea. In the case of contraband goods, the seizure of them is lawful only when they are destined to the ports of their enemies; and the contraband goods only are liable to confiscation. But the commencement of the war, and the raising of the seamen to seize, in a contrary manner, any English vessel that may happen to be in American waters, made it necessary for the enemy to seize these, and to suffer them to be treated by the English. As this could not be ascertained beforehand, we wished to know what was the cause of capture and condemnation—that the English vessel has sailed to or from a port in possession of the English. We are not informed that the English vessels are vessels for this cause. We have heard of several American vessels being captured and confiscated by the French, merely because they had not a sea letter, when no doubt could have been entertained of the property being American. Yet it is conceived that French cruisers of war have never interfered with the property of neutrals.

Further: ought we to have imagined that the executive directory intended to leave it to the discretion of every privateer, and of every inferior tribunal, to judge what, at any time subsequent to their decree, was the actual treatment of American vessels? The French armed vessels from the British? Ought we to have imagined that the decree was formed in such indefinite terms as to admit of construction, and that we were called upon to interpret the meaning of the directory? Ought we to have imagined that Mr. Adet has himself declared to be the meaning of the decree, that the French armed vessels were not to content themselves with capturing American vessels, having English property or contraband goods on board, and getting such property and goods condemned by their tribunals, but, if any English tribunals should not make a decision in a contrary manner, the French commanders were to practise "vacation"?"Did not the decree of the directory intend the citizens of France should be encouraged to take revenge on their friends for the outrages of their enemies? And what is to limit these vacations? If one English commander in a neutral country, and without any proper authority, seizes an English vessel, is every French officer to become his rival in dishonesty? Or, if we are to suffer only measure for measure, (and surely the decree goes not beyond this) who is to designate the hundred thousand French officers, who is to be the instrument of similar oppression? But French armed vessels are to make all these captures in violation of the treaty, and we are to suffer all these vacactions in violation of the treaty. What is this but to surrender them to the caprice of the "decree" propounded to the British state? And what opposition will be deemed efficacious? For all captures made by the British, contrary to the law of nations, we have, agreeably to that law, demanded satisfaction. The British have engaged to make it satisfactory to the owners, to indemnify and compensate those demands. What opposition could have been more efficacious? What further opposition can be hazarded?

Instead of further comments on this subject, let me present to you some passages in Mr. Adet's letter of the 14th of July, 1795. In this letter, he communicated to the Secretary of State the decree of the Committee of Public Safety, and the article 14th of November, 1794. The latter violated our treaty by subjecting the property of the enemies of France, on board American vessels, to capture, and by adding to the list of articles contraband it was therefore repealed by the former. Mr. Adet seized this occasion to make the following declaration: "You will see, sir, (said he) in both [the decrees] the undisguised disposition and sincere desire of the French Government, religiously to observe the engagements it has contracted with its allies, and its readiness to redress infractions which have never taken place but from the impulse of circumstances. It is amidst her triumphs that the republic loves to give this striking mark of its fidelity. Victorious France knows no other concern than that of peace, no other diplomatic language than that of truth." To this truth, to this justice, to this fidelity, we now make our appeal.

From the style of Mr. Adet's complaint of the British being suffered to run in our ports, it might be imagined the instances were numerous. None were permitted. The actual armaments were few, and are as old as the year 1793, as far as I am aware, and are of the state. "We are not informed by the British Government to the representations of the minister of the French republic in this respect? It said that these vessels sailed too suddenly; that it was not able to cause them to be stopped." The answer was given by the Secretary of State in different words: "The vessels from Charleston and Philadelphia have gone before it was known to the French Government, and the former, indeed, states that the orders of the two vessels were taken in so distant a port." In the case of the Trusty, Captain Hale, at Baltimore, the Governor of Maryland having been informed that she had been bringing guns, had given orders to search the vessel; "but she got off before the search was made." But in the case of the French convent, both had departed for many days before he had been informed of them. This is stated by the convention, Mr. Jefferson, 1795, to have been the case. "The vessels charged by Mr. Adet with violating the treaty, because it did not stop them! Although the officers of the United States were required to be watchful, and to report all illegal armaments in our ports, yet it was natural for the Government to be particularly vigilant in regard to all attempts at such breaches. The consul, who, doubtless, were charged by their own Government to be particularly vigilant in regard to all attempts at such breaches, were, in fact, not charged with the conduct of these vessels, and, in this respect, they were not amenable to the United States.

Mr. Adet remarks that "some inhabitants of the United States had aided in these illegal armaments" of the enemies of France and asks, "What measures were taken against them? Was any search made to discover them; to prosecute them?"... Yet the very letter from Mr. Genet to the Secretary of State, in which, and its enclosures, Mr. Adet has found this subject of complaint, suggests a different conclusion: "I learn, with pleasure, (says Mr. Genet) by your letter of the 33d of this month, [June, 1793,] that the government of Georgia has caused to be stopped a vessel armed in that State, for the purpose of cruising against the French, and that the persons in question have been treated with considerable severity by the Georgia authorities."

I shall say but a few words on the subject of the letters of which Mr. Adet complained that they remained unanswered. The first (of September 28, 1795) contained those reproachful insinuations which were recited in my letter of the 1st of November last. Why were these introduced but if they were not to be applied? An answer, however, was made, and a premature conclusion drawn, without waiting for the information which it was hoped to receive by return post, to avoid irritations, the answer was not sent. It was deemed of the less consequence, seeing, in my letter to Mr. Monroe, of the 13th of September, 1795, the sentiments and reasons of the Government, on that and other subjects relating to France, and that Mr. Genet had already written to some Mr. de Pincéney to procure him to see to the subject, that the correspondence was silent. But the answer was not sent. That was not the subject of the answer, but a subject which Mr. Adet's letter of March 13, 1796, had brought up. That letter was answered on the 23d of May, 1796, which shows that in that correspondence it was agreed that the letters of Mr. Genet, in July, 1795, had been answered, as well as the letter of that date, which Mr. Adet had written to Mr. Genet, on the 13th of September, 1795. Mr. Genet, in a letter, of the 23d of May, 1796, had said: "Mr. de Pinçéney has so frequently detailed to Lord Grenville, and in the next page, in his letter to Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Pinçéney says, 'The protection afforded our seamen remains also on the same footing; they (the Americans) have professed to see to this security, and they observe the law; but the proof they will not dispense with.' To remove, as far as possible, the embarrassments arising from this cause, and more effectually to protect our seamen, was the object of a bill pending in Congress, and the subject of public debate at the time I received his letters, and the bill was sent to the Senate."

On the subject of the impressment of our seamen, mentioned in Mr. Adet's letters of March and April, 1796, I shall only add, that nothing was more mortifying than that this question was avoided in the treaty, and the United States, with the same dispatch, received remonstrance from our Government to the British court. Thus, in Mr. Pinçéney's note to Lord Grenville, in August, 1793, which was published here that year in the same collection of State papers with Mr. Jefferson's letter of September 7th, this Mr. Adet has quoted, and on the fifth page next succeeding it, we find the following: "Under this head, it may be observed, that in regard of arrangements being made for the security of American seamen in the ports of this country, (England) they are subject to the various hardships Mr. Pinçéney has so frequently detailed to Lord Grenville." And, in the next page, in his letter to Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Pinçéney says, "The protection afforded our seamen remains also on the same footing; they (the Americans) have professed to see to this security, and they observe the law; but the proof they will not dispense with." To remove, as far as possible, the embarrassments arising from this cause, and more effectually to protect our seamen, was the object of a bill pending in Congress, and the subject of public debate at the time I received these letters."

As to the question of contraband, not now renewed by Mr. Adet, is that against the Government for permitting the purchase and exportation of horses, by British agents, in the course of the last winter and spring. The correspondence on this subject is lengthy, and yet the question lies within a very narrow compass. Perhaps no rule is now better established than that neutral nations have a right to trade freely with nations at war, and that the subjects of such nations may deal with the belligerents, and sell to them all kinds of merchandise, or permitting them to come on board and purchase the same commodities in the neutral territory; in the latter case, not refusing to one Power at what it permits another to purchase; with this exception, it is due to articles contraband, that, if the coarsers of one of the belligerent Powers meet at sea with vessels laden with such and are furnished with a passport, the neutral vessels may be captured, and the contraband goods will be lawful prize to the captors; but the residue of their cargo, and the vessels themselves, to be discharged.

But, if there were any doubt on this point, under the law of nations, there can be none in relation to France and the United States, as this was repeatedly represented to their Government, that the treaty of 1778 from restraining the trade of either party remaining neutral, while the other is engaged in war, provides regulations agreeably to which it should be conducted.

The 12th and 13th articles authorize either belligerent to lay at war, to stop the neutral merchant vessels of the other destined to the ports of an enemy, under such grounds of suspicion concerning the voyage or the lading. If, on examining the ship's papers, it appears there are any contraband goods on board, "consigned for a port under the obedience of his enemies," the ship may be carried into port, and the contraband articles may, by regular proceedings in the admiralty, be confiscated. "Saving, always, as well the ship itself as any other goods found therein, which, by the saids articles, are to be deemed free; neither may they be detained on pretence of their being, as it were, infected by the good plunder, much less shall they be confiscated as lawful prize." It further provides that, if the master of the neutral ship shall be willing to deliver the contraband goods to the capter, and the latter receives them, then it is safe and proper for the neutral master, and all his crew and adveners, to take the ship, goods, and things of war, as far as the master shall wish to go, when that neutral ship shall have on board the enemies of the other, "they are not to be taken out unless they are soldiers in active service." These articles are so explicit, it may seem strange that a doubt should arise concerning them. I presume no one would overlook these provisions of the treaty, demanded that the Government should stop the exportation of horses by the British, upon the principle that it was a neutral duty required by the law of nations. An answer was given to his demands, in which the regulations of our treaty with France were particularly brought into view, as well as the British point. Mr. Adet, however, after some time, renewed his charge, and again kept the treaty out of sight. An answer was given to these renewed claims; and we heard no more on the subject until the French-privateers in the West Indies began to capture American vessels which had horses on board; you will find among the documents on this subject the copy of a decree of the citizens Victor Hugues and Lebuck, the special agents of the executive committee in the Windward Islands, condemning an American vessel and her entire cargo, for having a small number of horses on board—not bound to their enemy's but to a neutral port. And these special agents ground their decree on the advice they received from Mr. Adet, under the date of 14th Messenger, being July 3d, 1796, and a circular letter dated May 29th, 1796, as follows: "You must have the master had them in his pocket, and would have brought them home, but for the recollection of the interpreter, some hours after the sentence of condemnation had been passed. These citizens exercise, indeed, a very brief authority. The process in the case of a second American vessel, which, to complete her lading, had taken on board nineteen horses for the same port, was in this form: The captain being come before one of the agents, he, without any previous examination or hearing, addressing himself to the man that pronounced sentence in these words: "I have confiscated your vessel and cargo" closing the sentence with opprobrious language.

Mr. Adet, on the 18th of May last, revived his predecessor's claim of right, by treaty, to sell their prizes in our ports. This occasioned the correspondence on this subject which you will find among the documents collected on this occasion. He contents himself, however, with considering it as a right granted not positively, but by implication to England, and to a limited number of French vessels, as a prize of war. As if my friend's denial of a favor to my enemy, was, in fact, a grant of the same favor to me. The simple statement of the ground of the claim would seem sufficient to show that the treaty will not support it. That sales of French prizes have been at all permitted, has been owing to the indulgence of the British court, and the impression was created under the treaty to which I have before precisely the same that France herself contracted eighty years subsequent to her treaty with us, and with the same Power. This obligation is found in the 24th article of our treaty, and the 16th of the French treaty with Great Britain. Thus France and the United States allowed each to sell prizes in their ports, or to sell Henry's prize, or to any manner to exchange them. Consequently, had France remained at peace, and we engaged in a war with Great Britain, our privateers would not be permitted to sell their prizes in French ports.

*Mr. Adet, by mistake, dates it September 12.
And by the maritime law of France, prizes, except they are taken from her enemies, can stay in her ports no more than twenty-four hours, unless compelled by tempest to remain longer; and the sales of such prizes are forbidden, under severe penalties. But, notwithstanding the certainty of our right to forbid the sales of prizes in our ports, we permitted the French minister to obtain the express legal command of the chief justice of the United States, in the name of the States, to demand in favor of the United States a warrant in South Carolina, in May last, prohibiting the sale of a particular prize (the British ship Amity) at Charleston, the French agents sold the prize vessel, and the sale received the formal sanction of the French consul.

Yet, even this affair has been made a subject of complaint by Mr. Adet, because the deckers of that port refused a clearance to the vessel, although in default of the authority of the United States, and because he also declared, in case the act should be repeated, he should give advice to permit the exportation of the cargo of the prize ship, which, on a survey, had been reported to be irreparable.

The French minister has discovered an aptitude to complain. I may cite, as instances, his letters of the 9th January and 3d of March, 1796, the former, because the colors of France, which he had presented to the United States, were not permanently fixed and displayed before Congress; the latter, because some printers of almanacs or other periodical publications in the United States, in arranging the names of the foreign ministers and agents residing in the United States, have placed in front of the names of France and Spain, Mr. Adet desired my declaration in writing, that the Government of the United States had no concern in printing the works in which the agents of the French republic were registered after those of Great Britain, and that the works themselves might be suppressed. I gave him an answer in writing, with my consent to his publishing it in the necessary papers, agreeably to his request. The answer states that, in answer to the Government of France and to their minister, and independent of the letter, and with regard to the colors, I insist observe that, in what concerns our foreign relations, the President being the sole representative of the People of the United States, they were properly presented to him. He received them with all possible respect, and directed them to be deposited with our national archives, that both might be preserved with equal care.

It remains to notice a summary of complaints exhibited by M. de la Croix, the French minister for Foreign Affairs, to Mr. Monroe, our minister at Paris, under the date of March 9th, 1796, to which the latter returned an answer, as having been referred to the Secretary of State, and the latter communicated to him.

First complaint: The courts of justice have taken cognizance of prizes brought into the United States by privateers in the ports of the United States.

Second complaint. The impunity of the outrage committed on the republic in the person of its minister, the citizen Fauchet, by the English ship Africa, in concert with the vice-consul of that nation, within the waters of the United States.

Third complaint. The treaty concluded in November, 1794, between the United States and Great Britain.

Excepting the second complaint, relative to the attempt of the English ship Africa to seize Mr. Fauchet and his papers, and the 3d article under the first complaint, relative to the consular convention, all the charges in this summary are either to be inadmissible or of no consequence.

As to the consular convention, many inconveniences would attend the giving to the consuls a jurisdiction to the extent contended for on the part of the French republic, to be exercised by the French consuls in the United States, and consequently, by American consuls in France. The inconveniences are manifestly so great as to require very strong considerations to be produced in their favor; and, as the parties are perfect strangers to each other, the evidence must be abundant and clear, the authority must be conclusive, the proceedings must be more definite, and the reasoning must be more cogent than in any other case where the evidence is less satisfactory and the parties less familiar.

This article deals with the 12th article of the treaty. It highlights the nature of the agreement and its implications for the enforcement of maritime law within the United States. The provision under discussion concerns the arrest of French seamen or vessels within the territorial waters of the United States, and the subsequent trial of such cases by American courts. The article argues that such arrests and trials should be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and that French consuls should not have the authority to intervene or interfere with these proceedings.

The article also touches upon the broader implications of the treaty, emphasizing the importance of maintaining sovereignty and jurisdiction over American waters. It concludes by stating that the treaty should be interpreted in a manner that upholds the rights and interests of the United States, ensuring that French seamen and vessels are subject to the laws of the United States and that their cases are handled within the judicial system of the country. The article further highlights the need for careful consideration and adherence to international agreements to prevent conflicts and ensure the peaceful resolution of disputes.
those men were a part of the crew." It is apparent that the original roll, and not a copy, is here referred to; nor, indeed, is the contrary pretended; but it is said that the 9th article admits certified consular copies, as evidence in the courts of both nations. But the 9th article appears to have no relation to the subject of the 9th. It stipulates that the said ships' rolls respectively shall have the exclusive right of receiving in these relations vessels, the declarations, and information of all the masters of the vessels, and merchants of their merchandise, which may choose to make there, even their testaments and other disposals by last will; and the copies of the said acts, duly authenticated by the said consuls, under the seal of their consular, shall receive faith in law, equally as their original acts (a copy of a vessel's roll) is a very important evidence, but the evidence of a private agreement between the captain of a vessel and his crew; and when he alleges that any of them have deserted, the 9th article requires this original evidence of the fact to be produced to the judge, as the ground on which he shall issue his warrant to arrest them. And this is the construction put on this article by the judge; and, for ought I know, without any diversity of opinion. The difference alleged by Mr. Faucet in one of his letters to the Secretary of State, I have inquired into, and find he was under a mistake. And the mistake arose, probably, from this circumstance, that when, from the information of the consuls, there was danger that the deserter would withdraw, unless instantly apprehended, the judge he gave his warrant to arrest and bring before him the alleged deserter; but, when brought, that judge has not committed the man, or delivered him to the consul, unless the original roll was produced, to prove him one of the ship's crew.

As to the outrage against Mr. Faucet by the Africa man, in attempting to seize him and his papers, with his declaration, and the letter from the United States to the Captain of the Governor of Rhode Island, we have no doubt of the measures more efficacious could have been taken by the Executive than those which were adopted, to obtain satisfaction. After waiting a reasonable time for explanations on the part of Captain Home, and of Mr. Moore, the English vice consuls, and receiving none, the President revoked the exequatur of the vice consul, and desired the Governor of Rhode Island, where the Africa man was lurking, to give immediate notice to Captain Home the demand of the President that he should immediately remove from a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, where he had violated his rights; and further, to make known to that, in forty-eight hours after the requisition should be communicated to, all interested parties, that his man and ship might be at once removed.

It is very probable that the measures of the British vice consul, was withdrawn expressly for his knowingly transmitting to the Governor of Rhode Island a most insulting letter from Captain Home; because, although he was on board the Africa when the attempt was made against Mr. Faucet, the President had no evidence of his co-operation. The Vice and the consul of the United States in London were immediately instructed, and the Vice to London, and to demand his exemplary punishment. It was not to be expected that he would be heard; and consequently, much delay must have ensued. From her station on the coast of North America, the Africa went to the West Indies. Seeing, some time since, by an article in the newspapers, that the Africa was returned to England, our minister in London was reminded of this affair, that the demand of satisfaction might be renewed.

Although the subject of M. de la Croix's third and last complaint (the British treaty) has been already discussed, allow me here to make a few remarks. He says "it will be easy to prove that the late treaty, have knowingly and evidently sacrificed their connexions with the republic, and the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality." The reverse of what the minister considers so easy to prove, we think has been demonstated. Our legally binding connections with France we always considered as being formed by our treaties; and we say, with confidence, that we have not been "evidently" violated a single article. If individuals have at any time infringed them, the Government has been sincere and diligent in its endeavors to redress the wrong. If the ties of affection, of warm enthusiastic friendship, have been weakened, the cause is to be sought for not in the acts of the American Government, which have been constantly directed to the preservation of our peace and commerce, but to some misunderstanding of our Revolution, and our partiality for the cause of liberty and self government, for which she engaged in her own, that made us endure numerous injuries, almost without complaining. We were not willing to ascribe to the republic the outrages of her ministers against the laws, the sovereignty, and the dignity of the United States, or the exceptional style of their communications. Even when, for such flagrant aggressions, often repeated, we desired the recall of one of her ministers, it was done in the most soothing language; and in the mean time, lest the interest of the republic should suffer, he was permitted to exercise his functions in all cases in which those interests could be affected. When his successor arrived, he officially requested, that the offense might be apprehended, that he might be sent to France: but the Government, satisfied by his removal, declined the measure. Some irritations were experienced from that successor. What sensations have been produced by Mr. Adet's notes, your own feelings, on the perusal, will enable you to judge. If he intended to excite the general indignation of our citizens, he is not disappointed: but it is presumed that it has not the object. After an exhibition of complaints in a style so exceptionable, he could add but one more improper act, that of publishing his notes in the newspapers: he had scarcely transmitted them to the Executive, before he forwarded them to the printer for publication.

From the foregoing it will appear that the complaints of the United States to violate our treaty, or weaken our engagements with France: that whatever resistance it has opposed to the measures of her agents, the maintenance of the laws and sovereignty of the United States, and their neutral obligations, have rendered indispensable. That it has never acquiesced in any acts violating our rights or interfering with the advantages stipulated in the France, but, on the contrary, has opposed them by all the means in its power: that it has withheld no succors from France that were compatible with the duties of neutrality to grant that as well by their independent political rights as by the express provisions of the commercial treaty with France. The United States were at full liberty to enter into commercial treaties with any other nation, and consequently, with Great Britain: that no facts, manifesting a partiality to that country, have been, and I add that none such can be, produced.

Of the propriety and justness of these conclusions, you will endeavor to satisfy the French Government; and, considering that the faith and honor of our country, the interests of our commerce, and above all, the most sanguine expectations that they will be satisfied. We even hope that this has been already accomplished; and that you will be saved from the pain of renewing a discussion which the Government has entered upon with regret. Your mission and instructions prove its solicitude to have prevented this necessity, and the sincerity of which no one can successfully doubt, by the manner in which you have answered the complaints, by showing that they are groundless; to restore confidence, so unfortunately and injuriously impaired; to explain the relative interests of both countries, and the real sentiments of your own" have been attended with success. And, as a consequence thereof, we rely on the repeal of the decrees and orders which expire the commerce to indebt others, which militate with the obligations of treaties, and our rights as a neutral nation. I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 1.

Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State.

LOCATION AT PHILADELPHIA.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, in conformity to the orders of His Government, has the honor of transmitting to the Secretary of State of the United States, a resolution taken by the executive directory of the French republic, on the 14th Messidor, 4th year, [July 2, 1796] relative to the conduct which the ships of war of the republic are to hold towards neutral vessels. The flag of the republic will treat the flag of neutrals in the same manner as they shall suffer it to be treated by the English.
The sentiments which the American Government have manifested to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, do not permit him to doubt that the light, that measure, as far as it may concern the United States and that they will also feel that it is dictated by impositive circumstances, and that for that reason they could not have been in the observance of her treatment knowing that it was a principle of the republic to respect the flags of all nations, that respecting the American vessels, we have been in the beginning of the war, has caused neutral vessels, and in particular American vessels, to be detained; taken them under the neutral flag, and arranged from the Frenchmen and French property. France, bound by a treaty with the United States, could find only a real discretion such articles as shall be regarded as respect to America, American property found on board American vessels. They had a right, under this consideration, to demand that every American property on board neutral vessels, declaring, at the same time, that the measure should cease when the English general order. But the English refused to comply with the law which contained this exception, so favorable to Americans. The manner in which the English conducted themselves, the manifest intention they had to stop the exportation of provisions from America to France, rendered it unavoidable.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary, by this, has removed the equilibrium of neutrality which England had destroyed; had discharged their duty in a manner justified by a thousand past examples, as well as by the necessity of the then existing moment. They might, therefore, before they revoked the orders they had given to seize enemy's property on board American vessels, have waited till the British Government had first definitely revoked the same order; the favorable manner which was produced by the embargo laid by Congress the 30th March, 1791. But as soon as they were informed that, under orders of the Government of the United States, Mr. Jay was determined to restrain against the vexations measures of the English, they gave orders, by the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, to send the ships of war of the republic, to respect American vessels; and the committee of public safety, in their explanatory resolve of the 16th of February, 1792, has, indeed, sanctioned the same principles. The National Convention and the committee of public safety had reason to believe that this open breach of the law, which determined the United States to use every effort to stop a to the vexations practised against their commerce, to the injury of the United States, such republic as the present time, in circumstances different from those, before France adopted the measure I have just spoken of, the English did not abandon the plan they had formed, and continued to stop and carry their ports all American vessels bound to French ports, or returning from them.

This conduct was the subject of complaints addressed, on the 7th Vendemiaire, 4th year, [29th September, 1795, O. S.] to the Secretary of State. The remonstrances which it contained were founded upon the duties of neutrality, upon the principles which Mr. Jefferson had laid down in his letter to Mr. Pinckney, 23d September, 1795, and which this note has remained without an answer, though recalled to the remembrance of the Secretary of State, by a despatch of the 9th Germinal, 3d year, [29th March, 1796, O. S.] and American vessels, bound to French ports, or returning from them, have still been seized by the English. Indeed, more; they have added a new vexation to those they had already imposed upon Americans: they have imposed seamen from on board American vessels, and have demanded the means of strengthening their crews at the expense of the Americans, without the Government of the United States having made known to British vessels the steps they had taken to obtain satisfaction for this violation of neutrality, so hurtful to the interests of France as the American Government had set it was the duty of the Secretary of the French minister to the despatches to the Secretary of State, of the 9th Germinal, 4th year, [29th March, 1796, O. S.] 9th Germinal, [8th April, 1796, O. S.], and 1st Fructidor, [18th August, 1796] which have remained without an answer.

The French Government, then, finds itself, with respect to America, in the same circumstances similar to those of the year 1793; and, if it sees itself obliged to abandon, with respect to them and neutral Powers generally, the favorable line of conduct it had pursued, and to adopt different measures, the blame should fall upon the British Government. It is their conduct which the French Government has been obliged to follow.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary conceives it his duty to remark that the Secretary of State, that the neutrals, or the allies of the republic, have nothing to fear as to the treatment of their flag by the French, since, if it do not affect the breach of neutrality, they cause the rights of that neutrality to be respected by the English, the republic will respect them. But if, on the other hand, it does not affect the breach of neutrality, and turn it to their advantage, could they then have a reasonable pretense, for the neutrality, for the neutral nation, and on the other hand Powers the same advantages; and that neutrality no longer exists, when, in the course of the war, that neutral nation grants neutral advantages not stipulated by treaties anterior to the war, or suffers that Power to seize upon them. The neutral Government which, in the other belligerent, Power desires to enjoy advantages which its enemy enjoys, or if it avails itself of them; otherwise, the neutral Government would deviate, with respect to its, from the line of neutrality, and would become its enemy.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary thinks it useless further to develop these principles. He does not doubt that the Secretary of State feels all their force, and that the Government of the United States will perfectly maintain a neutrality which France has always respected, and will always respect, when her enemies do not make it turn to their detriment.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary embraces this opportunity of reiterating to the Secretary of State the assurance of his esteem and information, at the same time, that he will cause this note to be printed, in order to make publicly known the motives which, at the present juncture, influence the French republic.

The executive directory, considering that, if it becomes the fault of the French nation to respect treaties or conventions which secure to the flags of some neutral or friendly Powers, commercial advantages, the result of which is to the advantage of those Powers, those same advantages, if they should turn to the benefit of our enemies, either through the weakness of our allies, through failure, through interested views, or through whatever motives, would, in fact, warrant the inexecution of the article in which they were stipulated, decrees as follows:

All neutral allied Powers shall, without delay, be notified that the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them.

The Minister of Foreign Relations is charged with the execution of the present resolve, shall not be printed.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 1, 1796.

Sir:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 27th ultimo, covering a decree of the executive directory of the French republic, concerning the commerce of neutral nations.

The principles which the French republic has assigned to regulate the rights secured to them by the laws of nations, and others, between whom and the French republic treaties have imposed special obligations. Where no treaties exist, the republic, by seizing and confiscating the property of their enemies found on board neutral vessels, would only exercise an acknowledged right under the laws of nations. If, towards such neutral nations, the French republic should manifest a determination to carry into execution the principles which it has perfectly gratified. The United States, by virtue of their treaty of commerce with France, stand on different ground.

In the year 1778, France voluntarily entered into a commercial treaty with us, on principles of perfect reciprocity, and expressly stipulating that free ships should make free goods; that is, if France should be at war with any nation with whom the United States should be at peace, the French nation, and the vessel of the French nations (soldiers in actual service excepted) found on board the vessels of the United States, were to be free from capture. That, on the other hand, if the United States should engage in war with any nation, while France remained at peace, then the vessels, goods, and effects of the American nation, and the vessel of the United States, found on board vessels of the French nation, were to be free from capture. This is plainly expressed in the twenty-third article of that treaty, and demonstrates that the reciprocity thereby stipulated was to operate at different periods; that is, at one time in favor of one of the contracting parties, and of the other at another time. At the present time, the United States being at peace, they possess by the treaty, the right of carrying the goods of the French nations, without subjecting them to capture. But what do the spirit of the decree of the executive directory and the current of your observations require? That the United States should now gratuitously renounce this right.

And what reason is assigned for denying us the enjoyment of this right? Your own words furnish the answer. ‘France has declared a monopoly over the right of attacking our commerce; and the conclusion could hardly have been more just or more justly come to. The United States, by the French law, have been declared neutral, and the laws of their neutrality, and any new restrictions on our commerce by the British Government; on the contrary, we possess recent official information that no new orders have been issued. The captures made by the British, of American vessels having French property on board, are warranted by the law of nations. The force and operation of this law was contemplated by France and the United States when they formed their treaty of commerce; and it was understood on this point was meant an exceptation to a universal rule. Neither our weakness nor our strength have any choice, when the question concerns the observance of a known rule of the law of nations.

Now, this remark of Great Britain in capturing American vessels, bound to and from French ports, had been the subject of a note, which, on the 29th of September, 1795, you addressed to the Secretary of State, but which remained without an answer. Very sufficient reasons may be assigned for the omission.
The subject, in all its aspects, had been already officially and publicly discussed, and the principles and ultimate measures of the United States, founded on their rights, are as publicly fixed. But if the subject had not, by the previous discussions, been already exhausted, can it be a matter of surprise that there should be a repugnance to answer a letter containing such insinuations as these? “It must, then, be clear, to every man who will discard prejudices, love, hatred, and, in a word, all the passions which lead the judgment astray, that the French republic would act in a right manner if they informed the English to interrupt the commercial relations which exist between her and the United States; if, by a perfidious condensation, it permitted the English to violate a right which it ought, for its own honor and interest, to defend; if, under the cloak of neutrality, it presented to England a premium to cut the throat of its fair and ally; if, in fine, partaking in the tyrannical and homicidal rage of Great Britain, it concurred to plunge the people of France into the horrors of famine.” For the sake of preserving harmony, silence was preferred to a comment upon these insinuations.

You are also pleased to refer to your letters of March and April last, relative to impressions of American seamen by British officers, who, it is said, have treated their men of war especially in a manner calculated to lower the character of their officers. As it is your business to secure the rights of the United States, which they have been so unprovoked as to infringe, I wish you were employed in carrying on a contest for the protection of your fellow citizens; and I do not think it desirable that you should be interrupted in the pursuit of so useful a task.

But permit me to recur to the subject of the decree of the executive directory.

As before observed, we are officially informed that the British Government have issued no new orders for capturing the vessels of the United States. We are also officially informed that, on the appearance of the notification of that decree, the minister of the United States, at Paris, in his minister in London, was dated the 29th of August. But the decree of the directory bears date the 14th Messidor, answering to the second of July. These circumstances, together with some observations in your note, leave the American Government in a state of uncertainty of the real intentions of the Government of France. Allow me, then, to ask of you, whether the new actual state of things is as publicly fixed. But if the subject had not, by the previous discussions, been already exhausted, can it be a matter of surprise that there should be a repugnance to answer a letter containing such insinuations as these? “It must, then, be clear, to every man who will discard prejudices, love, hatred, and, in a word, all the passions which lead the judgment astray, that the French republic would act in a right manner if they informed the English to interrupt the commercial relations which exist between her and the United States; if, by a perfidious condensation, it permitted the English to violate a right which it ought, for its own honor and interest, to defend; if, under the cloak of neutrality, it presented to England a premium to cut the throat of its fair and ally; if, in fine, partaking in the tyrannical and homicidal rage of Great Britain, it concurred to plunge the people of France into the horrors of famine.” For the sake of preserving harmony, silence was preferred to a comment upon these insinuations.

These questions, sir, you will see are highly interesting to the United States. It is with extreme concern that the Government finds itself reduced to the necessity of asking an explanation of this nature. And if it shall be informed that a new line of conduct is to be adopted towards the United States, the answers, in its judgment, to the questions which may now be questioned, after repeated discussions both here and in France, have been demonstrated to be founded, as we conceive, in the obligations of impartial neutrality, of stipulations by treaty, and of the law of nations. I hope, sir, you will find it convenient by an early answer to remove your doubts respecting the intention of the United States, and what, if any, are the precise terms of these orders.

I shall close this letter by one remark on the singularity of your causing the publication of your note. As it concerned the United States, it was properly addressed to its Government, to which alone pertained the right of communicating it, in such time and manner as it should think fit, to the citizens of the United States.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, now resident in the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 13 Brumaire, (3d November, 1796, O. S.)

5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I hasten to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 1st November, which was delivered to me last night, and which I find this morning in the newspapers.

I shall have the honor in a few days of furnishing you with more ample information on the object of which it treats. I cannot express too strongly my regret at not being able to determine the minutes at which the article of the executive directory which I had the honor to notify to you, bears mark of similarity with the supposed order in question in the letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Rufus King, which you cite, and which was made known to me by the newspapers.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respectful esteem.

Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

LEGATION AT PHILADELPHIA.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, now resident in the United States, a painful but sacred duty. He claims, upon the name of American honor, in the name of the faith of treaties, the execution of that contract which assured to the United States their existence, and which France regarded as the pledge of the most sacred union between two people, the freest upon earth. In a word, he announces to the Secretary of State, and must be the reply of the enemy. It is a principle abundantly enunciated in his embassy to us. It would have been pleasing to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary to have only to express, on the present occasion, the attachment which his Government bears to the American people, the vows which it forms for their prosperity, for their happiness. His heart, therefore, is grieved at the circumstances which impose on him a different task. With regret he finds himself compelled to substitute this reply of friendship for the assurance of his esteem.

With regret, also, his Government has ordered him to take that tone; but that very friendship has rendered it indispensable. Its obligations, sacred to men, are as sacred to Governments; and if a friend offended by a friend can justly complain, the Government of the United States, after the undersigned minister plenipotentiary shall have traced the catalogue of the grievances of the French republic, will not be surprised to see the executive directory manifesting their too just discontent.

When Europe rose up against the republic at its birth, menaced it with all the horrors of war and famine; when on both sides the French could not calculate the very manner in which the long-continued and out enemy turned the troops of this republic, a sweet sentiment mingled itself with those proud sentiments which the presence of danger, and the desire of repelling it, produced in their hearts. In America they saw friends. Those who went to brave tempests and death upon the ocean, forgot all dangers, in order to indulge the hope of visiting that American continent, where, for the first time, the French colors had been displayed in favor of liberty. Under the guarantee of the law of nations, under the protecting shade of a solemn treaty, they expected to find in the ports of the United States an asylum as safe as at home; they thought, if I may use the expression, there to find a second country. The French Government thought as they did. Oh hope, worthy of a faithful people, how hast thou been deceived! So far from offering the French the success with which friendship might have given without compromising it, the American Government, in this respect, violated the letter of treaties.

The 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778, states that French vessels of war, and those of the States, as well as those which shall have been armed for war by individuals of the two States, may freely conduct, where they please, the prizes they shall have made upon their enemies, without being subject to any admiralty or other duty; without the said vessels, on entering into the harbors or ports of France, or of the United States, being liable to be arrested or seized, or the officers of those places taking cognizance of the validity of the said prizes; which last part of the article is full liberty, and has been interpreted by the French that the captains of said vessels shall be obliged to show. And that, on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given to those who shall have made prizes upon the French or Americans; and that, if they should be forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, to enter, they shall be made to depart as soon as possible.

In contempt of these stipulations, the French privateers have been arrested in the United States, as well as their prizes; the tribunals have taken cognizance of the validity or invalidity of these prizes. It was vain to seek to justify these proceedings under the pretext of the right of vindicating the compromised neutrality of the United States. The facts aforesaid to be stated will prove that this pretext has been the source of shocking persecutions against the French privateers, and that the conduct of the Federal Government has been but a series of violations of the 17th article of the treaty of 1778.

On the 4th of August, 1793, a circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was sent to all the collectors of the customs. It accompanied regulations adopted by the President, prohibiting all armaments in favor of the belligerent Powers. These regulations immediately acquired the force of law, and the agents of the Government, and the tribunals, concurred in their execution. They gave them a retrospective effect, and caused to be seized in the ports of the United States the armed vessels and prizes which had come in prior to that time. But, even before these regulations, adopted by the President, had established any rule whatever upon the prohibition of armaments, the tribunals had already, by order of the Government, assumed the cognizance of prizes made by French vessels. (No. 1.) One of the predecessors of the undersigned protested against this, but in vain. The tribunals still continued their proceedings.

On the 3d of December, 1793, the President asked of Congress a law confirming the measures contained in the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, above mentioned. (No. 2.) This law was passed the 5th June, 1794. What was its result? In consequence of this law, the greater part of the French privateers have been arrested, as well as the French States. But, upon establishing a new tribunal, a necessary body of proofs, but upon the simple information of the consul of one of the Powers at war with the French republic; frequently upon that of sailors of the enemy Powers; sometimes according to the orders of the Governors, or often without them, the tribunals, who act by the district principles above the Government, (No. 2.) that their conviction was sufficient to authorize them, without complaint or regular information, to cause the persons to be prosecuted in virtue of the law above mentioned. (No. 4.)

When the ministers of the republic have asked justice of the Government for the vexations experienced by the privateers, in contempt of the 17th article of the treaty, they have not received the satisfaction promised.

Thus, when, on the 9th Fructidor, 3d year, (26th August, 1794) the predecessor of the undersigned addressed a complaint to the Government on this subject, the Secretary of State answered, on the 3d September, 1794, by a phrase that appears to have no effect.

Thus, when the same minister, on the 27th Vendémiaire, 3d year, (17th October, 1794) reminded the Secretary of State of the means he had proposed to him for putting an end to the measures adopted against the French privateers, when he caused him to see that this means, which consisted in requiring security from those who claimed the prizes as illegal, would prevent the enemies of the republic from instituting so many suits, of which they themselves perceived the injustice, he obtained no other answer than that his proposition relative to securities was inadmissible.

FRANCE.

When, on the 12th Floreal, 3d year, the same minister expressed himself in these terms, in a letter to the Secretary of State: "You have alleged, sir, that the Executive of the United States cannot interfere in the affairs of which the tribunals have taken cognizance; in admitting this objection for all the business now in suit, I do not the less think that your Government could, by general measures, bring back the jurisdication of the American tribunals. In the event of such a necessity, the people of the United States would view with horror the idea that the Supreme Law of the land; it might make known that the facility with which your courts of admiralty admit, without distinction, all the chicanery which our enemies create against us, in the present war, is evidently contrary to the spirit of the union, and that the Government of the United States, to whose attention the Secretary of State heretofore noticed the particular fact which had occasioned the note of citizen Fauchet. What was the undersigned minister plenipotentiary able to obtain in the affair of the Cassius and of the Vengeance? Nothing.

The Government of the United States must have seen, however, by the claims which the ministers of the republic addressed to it, and by the great number of facts of which it has had a knowledge, how much the execution of the measures addressed to the President, and of the law of the 5th of June, 1794, was contrary to the 17th article of the treaty; how much the agency of the tribunals, who ought not to have any cognizance of the validity or invalidity of private documents of the part of the republic, but have the power to annul by the execution of the law the acts which they have declared to be contrary to the national law. It was not evident that, when the Powers at war with the republic had the privilege, in virtue of the law of the 5th of June, 1794, of causing to be arrested the privates and their prizes, of detaining them in the ports of the United States, it was proper to think that these powers, desirable to the extension of the privileges of the French, could derive from this privilege immense advantage to the detriment of France? Doubtless, it was of little import to them that sometimes the privateers obtained justice, in the last resort, if they detained the privateer for a length of time, by that means, sheltered from their pursuit, the commerce of the enemy of France. The neutrality of the United States, in this case, was against the advantage of the Federal Government; on seeing this state of things, should, out of respect to its neutrality and to treaties, have solicited from the Congress the means of conciliating the duties of the former with the obligations of the latter.

The Government very well knew how to solicit the law of the 5th of June, 1794, when that law was to bear on French ships, and not on the privateers; to the tribunals, and not to the courts; to the same purpose, which enables them to decide upon prizes. Why, on seeing the inconveniences of this law, has it not endeavored to remedy them? Should it wait to be solicited on this head? Should it not anticipate all claims, and, when these were presented by the ministers of the republic, decide on their justice?

Besides, if the Government had been impartial, as it had pretended to be, it would not have adopted that slow and circuitous mode, so favorable to the enemies of France, for deciding the cases relative to its neutrality; it would have preferred the measures proposed by Mr. Jefferson, on the 25th of June, 1793, to the minister of the republic. The French Government, it is true, decided upon neutrality at the same time, and gave them the same authority. The Federal Government had decided questions which interested its neutrality, upon informations furnished by the State Governors and the agents of the republic; the prizes remained in the hands of the French consuls until this decision took place; the stipulations of the 17th article of the treaty were not violated; and the Government, at the same time, satisfied the obligations of duty and justice. In vain would such efforts have been of any power. Notwithstanding the law of the fifth of June, 1794, giving to the tribunals the right of taking cognizance of cases in which neutrality had been violated, did not the President, on the 21st of June, 1794, decide that the ships of war of the United States should be brought to the French ports? On the 30th of July, 1794, did he not decide that the Pilgrim had been taken in the waters of the United States, and that, of course, she should be given up to the owners? In these cases, the President not only decided on matters of which the cognizance of which had been sanctioned by the consuls, but likewise gave a retrospective effect to his own decisions.

Thus the English privateer Trusty, Captain Hall, was armed at Baltimore, to cruise against the French, and sailed, notwithstanding the complaints of the consul of the republic. At Charleston, one Bermudian vessel, several English vessels, and one Dutch vessel, from the 24th of May, to the 6th of June, 1793, took cannon in their defence, and sailed without opposition.

What answer did the Government give to the representations of the minister of the French republic, in this respect? They have decided, as we see it too suddenly: that it was not able to cause them to be stopped: but the treaty was not less violated. Some inhabitants of the United States had aided these illegal armaments. What measures were taken against them? Was any search made to discover them—to prosecute them? Never: and yet the countries of the United States, who had learned that the treaty of Versailles seemed to contain, the French were arming in the ports of the United States, than the most energy, the order was sent for stopping these armaments. Even citizens of the United States were imprisoned upon suspicion that they had participated in them. The minister cannot omit citing here the following passage of a letter from the Secretary of State, Edmund Randolph, to Mr. Hammond, dated June 6, 1794: "On a suggestion of citizens of the United States that had taken part in the act, [he speaks of the armaments in the United States] one who was designated was instantly committed for prosecution; one or two others have been since named and committed in like manner, and, should it appear that there were still others, no measures would be spared to bring them to justice." What more could the American Government do in favor of the English, if they had a similar treaty to that with France, and had been sole possessors of the advantages assured to her by positive stipulations?

However, in contempt of these very stipulations, the Argonaut, an English ship of war, in January, 1795, convoyed the squadron commanded by the French in the river of St. Lawrence, and the ship L'Esperance, Capt. Sisson, in the river Saganaw, and of his brother, after her return, in order to send her upon a cruise. Letters were in consequence written by the Secretary of State to the Governor of Virginia, and to Mr. Hammond. What was the result? Nothing. On the 9th of May, 1795, the Federal Government had not yet done any thing positive as to the acts which produced the complaint of the minister of France. The Secretary of State had not sent any despatches, in order to receive the information which are verified, the Federal Government will not be in the rear of its obligations." To that has the reparation demanded by the republic been limited.

What are we to think of these delays, when we see the officers of the Government acting with so much activity against the French, on the slightest suspicion that they have violated the neutrality: when, in his letter of 9th April, 1794, the Secretary of State answers the complaints of the English minister: "We have received no intelligence of the particular facts to which you refer; but, to prevent all unnecessary circuitry, in first inquiring into them, and next transmitting the result, we have not as yet constructed the instruc-
If the Government of the United States had wished to maintain itself in that impartiality which its duties prescribed it had wished freely to execute the treaties; it would not have waited, every time that the English interpretation had not satisfied it, to have recourse to interpretations so precise, that the Govern-ernors of the States, and subaltern officers of the Federal Government, might know where their rights began, in order to maintain the execution of treaties. Why have the most energetic orders (such as the Secretary of State, or the President issuing them) produced no effect, when the support of the neutrality involuntarily in favor of the English came in question? Why have the measures taken by the Government, though so much weakens when France was interested? Why, in fine, have the multiplied remonstrances of her ministers never produced the redress of grievances of which they complained?

A previous and honest minister plenipotentiary claimed the execution of the 17th article of the treaty, interdicting the entry into the American ports of English vessels which should arrive after 22d May, 1797, from the French; when he cited this simple and formal stipulation: "on the contrary, neither asylum nor refuge shall be given, in the ports or harbors of France, or of the United States, which vessels shall have made prizes of the United States, or whose crews, officers, or privateers, or any of them, have had the honor of making prizes. It is evident that the Government adds to the letter of the treaty, in this circumstance; and it is not but natural that it admits a construction of the treaty, when it expects to find a meaning disadvantageous to France, and, in other instances, to find a construction which is favorable to the republic? But has it the right of construing the treaty, of changing, of its own accord, the sense of a clear and precise stipulation, when the execution of the concurrence of the other contracting party? Doubtless not, especially when, by so doing, it wounds her interests.

The 17th article, by the 23d article, pretends to support his construction of the 17th article. What does this 23d article contain? It reserves, and not without reason, to the United States from arming in the respective ports of the two Powers, of selling their prizes, or of discharging all or part of their cargo there. Mr.

But admitting, for a moment, the construction gratuitously given by the Secretary of State to the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, this article has not the less been violated, when the Argonaut, which had quitted Hampton Roads in order to capture the Terpsichore, was seized by the French, on the 11th of April, 1799, in the privateer la Montagne. In vain were sought, in the resources of English law and custom, to prevent this injury being done by an English vessel; the facts speak, and every upright mind, not blinded by passion, will necessarily yield to their

In his message to the Senate of the 16th April, 1794, the President declared that Mr. Jay was sent to London only to obtain the redress of the wrongs done to the United States; at the same time, the Secretary of State committed to the President's successor a part of the instructions to Mr. Jay, reminding him of the intention of the American Government towards the States and territories with the republic of France. The French minister, devolved by this communication, contributed ingenuously to deceive, and the American, to be deceived.

In fact all that could render the neutrality profitable to England, and injurious to France, is combined in this treaty.

In the 23d article of the treaty of Versailles, the United States have the liberty of freely carrying on commerce, with the enemies of France. The 24th article of the treaty with Holland, the 10th article of the treaty with Sweden, and the 13th article of the treaty with Prussia, contain the same stipulation. This last article gives even more extensive powers to the United States, by permitting them to carry to the enemies of this Power, and the articles enumerated in the list of such as are contraband of war, without their being liable to confiscation. But, by the 18th article of the treaty of London, the Secretary of State has, therefore, by this stipulation, granted to the English a right which they had refused.
ed, in consequence of the modern public law, to other nations with whom they have made treaties that of seizing on board their vessels, articles proper for the coasting trade. The tuck or shipping. and, according to the Plenipotentiary, vessels, which, and all other things, he thinks proper for the construction of vessels: yet, prior to the treaty of 1783, all vessels excluded between John Jay and Lord Grenville, the United States had the right of carrying on commerce with every Power: the partiality of the American Government in favor of England has, therefore, been such, that not only the intercourse between the United States, and all other vessels, have been safe from seizure.

In vain will it be objected that France, having the right, by her treaty of 1778, to enjoy all the advantages in commerce and navigation, which the United States have granted to England, is not injured by the stipulations of the treaty of 1794, relative to contraband of war, as they become common to her. But the right secured to her, by the second article of the treaty of 1793, extending to her the same privileges, is an resentment inspired by the ambition of England, have definitely given, and shall give to her in Europe. These dispositions, during the course of the war, the situation of the United States towards England, and the belligerent Powers allied to France; the interest of these Powers is common to France; and from the moment that is injured, France is in justice entitled to the same protection.

After having assured to the English alone the carriage of naval stores, the Federal Government wished to assure them that of mercantile traffic; a word, it desired to have commerce only with England. Thus it stipulates, by the 18th article of the treaty, that in the case of a vessel being of English registry, it shall not be difficult to define the cases wherein provisions, and other articles which are generally excepted, could be classed in the list of contraband of war: thus it stipulates, in article 17th, that the American vessels may be arrested upon the single suspicion, either that they have merchandise belonging to the enemy, or that they carry to him articles contraband of war. In the United States, in their treaty with France, have made stipulations entirely opposite to those just cited: whilst its vessels of war are bound to respect the American flag going to English possessions, the English flag into their ports American vessels going to the ports of France; subject them to decisions more or less arbitrary, and often condemn them, on account of the name alone, of their owners; by which means, all the commercial relations between the United States and France are entirely suspended. What American will venture to send vessels into French ports? What commerce will he venture to undertake with the French possessions, when it will be certain that his funds, either in going to, or returning from, run the greatest hazard? Would he not rather prefer protecting his property in his own country to expose his vessels to the perils in the English sea? Would he not prefer Great Britain to France for his speculations? In virtue of the treaty of London, and by the course of things, would not the commerce of the United States pass entirely out of England, during the present war?

After having consented to such conditions, the American Government cannot pretend to impartiality; it cannot say that it has maintained an equal neutrality between France and England, since it has granted to Great Britain advantages denied to France. But every one of these advantages granted to England was a real injury to the republic; and, therefore, the United States, with all the responsibility that in granting to a belligerent Power advantages which it refuses to another, it is clear that the Government of the United States, after having made its treaty with Great Britain, ceased to be neutral, when it opposed itself to the participation by France, in the favors granted to the English.

In consequence, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary again declares, that the executive directory has just ordered the vessels of war and privateers of the republic to treat American vessels in the same manner as they suffer the English to treat them.

Were the treaty of London out of the question, the measure the executive directory now takes, would not be less contrary to justice. The undersigned minister plenipotentiary has developed to the Secretary of State, in his note of the 6th Brumaire last, [27th of October, 1796.] principles which leave no doubt in this respect, and which the answer of the Secretary of State, is far from destroying. (No. 5.) But the stipulations of treaties now come to the support of general principles. The republic calls for the execution of the second article of the treaty of 1793, and says that France and the United States mutually engage not to grant any particular favor, as to navigation or commerce, which shall, not immediately become common to the other party. The Government of the United States, having, by the treaty of London, sacrificed to England the freedom of their flag, the property of the enemies of England, and naval stores, France, by her treaty, is authorized to claim the same advantage, to make use of it, and the United States have no right to complain.

Certainly it would have been more conformable to the designs of France, to her principles, to see the American flag floating above the seas, to see the commerce of the United States enjoy that liberty, that freedom, which should belong to neutral nations; but in order to that, it was necessary that the American Government should know how to maintain that neutrality; it was necessary that it preserved it, free from violation by Great Britain; and if now the execution of the measures which the directory is obliged to adopt give rise to complications, it is not the less necessary that France should in no way, by stipulations contrary to the interests of their country, have brought the French Government to use the prerogatives granted to the English.

When, after having suffered to be violated the treaties which unite it to France, the Government of the United States has associated itself with England, and has rendered its neutrality as useful to that Power as it is now injurious to its ancient ally, could the republican be silent? Her outraged generosity, her wounded honor, prevented her silence were weakness and, strong in her principles as in her proceedings, she should demand her acknowledged justice.

Thus, therefore, as it results from the statement which the undersigned minister plenipotentiary has just given:

1st. That the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, has been violated; that, in contempt of this article, the American tribunals have been permitted to take cognizance of the validity of prizes made by French ships of war and privateers, under pretext of original armament or augmentation of armament in the United States, or of capture within the jurisdictional line of the United States.

2d. That the said article 17 has been equally violated by the admission of English vessels in the ports of the United States which had made prizes on Frenchmen, and by the admission of their prizes:

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary, in the name, and by the power of the executive directory, protests against the violation of the 17th article of the treaty of 1778, in contempt of which English vessels, which had made prize on Frenchmen, have been admitted into the United States, and within the jurisdictional line of the United States; as also, the violation of the 2nd article of the treaty the distinction which Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, has established in his letter of 29th May, 1795, in which he admits only the exclusion of the English vessels which bring in their prizes, and wishes to except from the prohibitory measure, the vessels which, after having made prizes, enter the ports of the United States; and, however, moreover, as the undersigned minister plenipotentiary regards the treaty of commerce concluded with Great Britain as a violation of the treaty made with France in 1778, and equivalent to a treaty of alliance with Great Britain; and that, justly offended at the conduct which the American Government has given to its subjects, if they have given him orders to suspend, from this moment, his ministerial functions with the Federal Government.

The same cause which for a long time prevented the executive directory from allowing their just resentment to break forth, has also tempered its effects. Neither hatred, nor the desire of vengeance, rapidly succeeded to the spirit of the heart of Frenchmen; the name of America still excites sweet emotions in it, notwithstanding the wrongs
The underseigned minister pleni potentaria therefore announces, that the Government of the United States, and the British Government, have declared their determined friendship towards each other; but as a mark of just discontent, which is to last until the Government of the United States returns to sentiments, and to measures, more conformable to the interests of the alliance, and the sworn friendship between the two nations.

This alliance was always dear to Frenchmen; they have done every thing to tighten its bands. The Government of the United States, on the contrary, has sought to break them. Scarcely had the war broken out between France and England, when America was alone invited to the commerce of the Antilles. All the colonial ports were open to her. It ever happened, more precisely, that the English made use of the fact, that the British vessels, which more than English violated the freedom of the neutral flag, the Convention was obliged to use against the French, and does not forbid that neutral vessels should be seized by the ships of the republic; she excepted the Americans from this measure.

Forced, against her inclination, to make it bear on them also, she waited, with impatience, for the moment, when she should assert her sentiments of friendship. When the Federal Government complained of the conduct of one of the precessors of the under mentioned their Government, she only the complaints of the Government of the United States, and immediately gave the most striking separation.

Let the annals of the French revolution be opened; let the minutes of that august sitting be seen, in which the National Convention received the minister of the United States into its bosom; the addresses were not studiously they sprang from hearts full of affection for an allied people; they breathed the feelings which dictated them, and the American minister found himself in the midst of his friends. What joy did not the American flag inspire when it waved unfurled in the French Senate? Tender tears trickled from each eye; every one looked at it with amaze ment! It was the token of the sympathy, that, above all beings, the United States were immovably united to France. It was the token of attachment, that, above all nations, the United States were immovably united to France.

What, then, was done by the Government of the United States? It put in question whether it should execute the treaties, or receive the agents of the rebel and proscribed princes, (No. 6.) It made an insidious proclamation of neutrality; by its act it inserted itself between the two nations; it exposed the commerce of both; it instantly placed itself in the scale of the French, for breaking the chains of its citizens at Algiers. (No. 7.) Notwithstanding treaty stipulations, it allowed the privateers to harry the vessels of the republic; it suffered England, by insulting its neutrality, to interrupt its commerce with France. Notwithstanding the faith of treaties, it gave an asylum to these same English, who, after having insulted her flag, pillaged her vessels, and sacrificed to those motives, occasioned and to take a station whence to course, or to give a favorable opportunity, against the French. It might be that it applauded their audacity; all submission to their will, it allowed the French colonies to be declared in a state of blockade, and its citizens interdicted the right of trading to them. (No. 8.) It eluded all the advances made by the republic, for renewing the treaties of commerce, upon a more favorable footing to both nations, (No. 9.) It excused itself on the most frivolous pretext; whilst it anticipated Great Britain, by soliciting a treaty in which, prostituting its neutrality, it sacrificed France to her enemies, or rather looked upon her as obliterrated from the map of the world; it forgot the services that she had rendered to the cause of the revolution.

Alas! time has not yet demolished the fortifications with which the English roughened this country, nor those the Americans raised for their defence; their half rounded summits still appear in every quarter; amidst plains—on the tops of mountains. The traveller need not search for the ditch which served to encompass them; it is still open under his feet. Why? for the first time, the United States have monuments of British fury, still to be found. Men still exist who can say, here a ferocious Englishman slaughtered my father; there my wife tore her bleeding daughter from the hands of an unbridled Englishman. Alas! the soldiers who fell under the sword of the Britons are not yet reduced to dust; the laborer, in turning up his field, still draws nigh his bones, with which the first English in the country recollected that his fields, now covered with rich harvests, have been moistened with French blood; whilst every thing around the inhabitants of this country animates them to speak of the tyranny of Great Britain, and of the gener alized immunities and freedom of France. How can they forget their debt to the republic, which has given cement with its blood the independence of the United States. It was at this moment their Government, when a treaty of amity with their ancient tyrant, the implacable enemy of their ancient ally. O! Americans, covered with noble scars! O! you who have so often flown to death and to victory with French soldiers! You who know those generous friends, who, on all the sea coasts have always been near their friends in arms! Consult them to-day, to know what they experience; recollect, at the same time, that, if magnuminos souls with liveliness ren an alfent, they also know how to forget one. Let your Government return to itself, and you will still find in Frenchmen faithful friends and generous allies.

NOTES IN SUPPORT OF THE FOREGOING.

(No. 1.) See letter from citizen Genet to Mr. Jefferson, of 22d June, 1793, message from the President, page 15 of the original.

(No. 2.) Extract of the President's speech to the House of Representatives, 3d December, 1793.As soon as the war in Europe had embraced those Powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations, there was an universal apprehension that our intercourse with them might be interrupted, and our disposition for peace drawn into question by the suspicions too often entertained by belligerent nations. It seemed, therefore, to be my duty, to inform my citizens of the consequences of a contrived trade, and of hostile sentiments of any of the parties; and to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you

In this posture of affairs, both new and delicate. I resolved to adopt general rules, which should conform to the treaties, and assert the privileges of the United States. These were reduced into a system, which will be communicated to you. Although I have not thought myself at liberty to forbear the sale of the prizes, permitted by our treaty with France, I have not been able to bear the expense, or return them to the parties, here as in any of the parties; and to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation. Under these impressions the proclamation which will be laid before you

It was with the wisdom of Congress to correct, improve, or enforce this plan of procedure; and it will, probably, be found expedient to extend the legal code, and the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, to many cases, which, though dependent on principles already recognized, demand some further provisions.

Where individuals shall, within the United States, array themselves in hostility against any of the Powers at war, or enter upon military enterprises or enterprises within the jurisdiction of the United States, or exercise judicial authority within the United States, or where the penalties on violations of the law of nations may have been indiscriminately marked, or are inadequate, these offenses cannot receive too early and close an attention, and require prompt and decisive remedies.
“Whatever those remedies may be, they will be well administered by the judiciary, who possess a long established course of investigation, effectual process, and officers in the habit of executing it.”

(No. 2.) The undersigned minister plenipotentiary having complained to the Secretary of State that the attorney of the United States had caused the privateer La Vengeance to be arrested, without an affidavit or other authority, the 17th instant, Mr. [name redacted], the Secretary of the Navy, had addressed to him in the absence of Mr. Harrison, district attorney of New York, in this passage: “As to the suit against the privateer, it was commenced by Mr. Harrison, as attorney for the district, upon an official disclosure to him, by the Spanish consul, that he had the information in his possession. Mr. Harrison, upon receiving this disclosure, felt himself called upon by considerations which, as a public officer, he could not resist, to proceed against the privateer under the third section of the act of Congress, entitled “An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, done in the sea, on the land, or water, and as a war measure, and for the purpose of enabling the President to make and execute treaties, of peace and amity, commercial, and other treaties, and other in this present instance. Mr. Harrison has acted from the best of his judgment upon the duty of his office, after officially obtaining information from a public officer, who conceived himself likewise bound, by the power of duty, to communicate the information.”

When the undersigned minister plenipotentiary renewed the charge, on the 3d Vendémiaire, 4th year (28th September, 1795) to the Secretary of State, and still complained that an affidavit was not required to cause a privateer to be arrested—he [the minister] expressed himself in these words: “But I again recur to the assertion that an affidavit is not necessary for arresting the order of a vessel.”

“Is it not, then, the general rule, and the law of nations, that a declaration of fact which has been made to the officer, is a sufficient ground for his proceeding? The complaint of the Spanish agent, since there was not a single affidavit, was insufficient to authorize the capture of the enemy’s ships. Our officers, in order to bring forward, the French privateers are to be subjected to seizure! Such a measure tends nothing less than to paralyze the seventeenth article of our treaty.”

The Secretary of State, in reply, stated to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary the copy of a letter from Mr. Harrison, 17th September, 1795, in which is this remarkable passage: “If this be the measure of justice we have, undoubtedly, acted from my own opinion, founded upon such evidence as came to my knowledge; and, as in similar cases, I must necessarily, in the first instance, be unacquainted with the opinions and convictions of others, I know of no other rule by which I can be guided, unless when I am honored with the directions of the chief executive magistrate.”

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary informs the Secretary of the State that in the case referred to as Mr. Harrison, 17th September, 1795, in which is this remarkable passage: “If this be the measure of justice we have, undoubtedly, acted from my own opinion, founded upon such evidence as came to my knowledge; and, as in similar cases, I must necessarily, in the first instance, be unacquainted with the opinions and convictions of others, I know of no other rule by which I can be guided, unless when I am honored with the directions of the chief executive magistrate.”

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary thus closes his letter on the 16th of October, covering that of Mr. Harrison: “You will perceive that, whatever may be the event of the suits pending in court, concerning her [the privateer], the undersigned minister plenipotentiary is, without the knowledge of the laws and usages of this country, upon such evidence and information as in the case referred to were produced.”

(No. 4.) In virtue of this law, the tribunals were only authorized to decide on cases in which the neutrality of the United States shall have been compromised. Yet these tribunals conceived they had a right to pronounce upon prizes made by the French, in almost an indifferent manner. In the affair of Glass and Gallais against the ship Venerable, of which the undersigned minister plenipotentiary spoke, it was decided that the neutrality of France was sufficient to give a right of declaring the prize a legal prize. This case was one of the first decided by a tribunal in France. The French privateers are not only not authorized to make prizes, but their claims are not recognized in France, as belongs to the most powerful nations. The neutrality of the United States was declared by a Russian vessel, of the 4th of August, 1793, the collectors of the customs were authorized, and even required, to visit, in the strictest manner, not only all privateers, but all vessels entering, or going out of, American ports. The law of 5th June authorized the President to support the exercise of these functions with military force. Of course they did not neglect to visit, with the greatest rigour, all French vessels, privateers, and others, during their continuance in the ports of the United States, and at their departure. They did not quit these ports but under the eye, and with the express permission, of the officers of the Government; for it had forbidden the collectors to clear them, if they committed the least violation on the neutrality of the United States, in which case they might be seized and confisicated. Yet, whether they had entered the ports of the United States armed, and also went out armed, or had been since armed for war in French ports, scarcely did one of their prizes enter but she was arrested by order of the Federal courts.

The proceedings were instituted and pursued without any of the forms for protecting citizens. As the undersigned minister plenipotentiary has said, the assertion of an enemy of the republic was sufficient for causing a prize to be seized; often the privateer which had brought her in, and sometimes for the arrest of her captain, no proof was required from the enemy consul who instigated the arrest; he was not obliged to give security for the damages which might arise, the capture of the prize, or from the uncertain effect of the seizure of a part of his property, on giving security for its value; the prizes were not valued; they simply placed them in the hands of the officers of justice; rarely were they permitted to be sold, and then the sale was made with slowness, and not till the consent of the two parties was obtained. In fine, when, after much delay and expense, notwithstanding the shifts of a crafty chicanery, the complainants proved nothing they advanced, the prizes were adjudged to the captors, but indemnification for damages and losses occasioned by this seizure was refused.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary knows but two affairs, that of la Nuestra Senora del Carmen, at Rhone, on the 1st December, 1793, it was not to the purpose of the priva- chicanery, and where damages and interest were allowed to the captors. Yet the tribunals have always allowed damages to the captured when they have declared the prizes illegal. The least pretext was sufficient to obtain from a tribunal a prize; it is, in fact, almost a pretext to allow all prizes, as one or two barrels of powder, opened some port holes in the territory of the United States.

In the affair of the two prizes of the French privateer Les Citoyens de Marseilles, which entered the port of Philad- elphia and armed and commissioned, repaired in the same port, and sent under the eyes of the Government, the only thing in question was, that some port holes were pretend to have been opened in the vessel after her arrival from Philadelphia; the court of Charleston was of opinion that the holes had been opened, and condemned the two prizes. The superior courts did not adopt this opinion, and the first sentence was reversed; but after how long a time, how much care, fatigue, pain, and expense!
In the affair of the Princesse des Asturias, at New York, as will be seen hereafter, only two cannon and a score of fuseses were in question.

Two cannon and twenty muskets could scarcely be an object of commercial speculation. The existence of the cannon has never been proved, and, certainly, whatever muskets were found on board, were only for the defence of officers of the American Government. The power of a few guns in the possession of a privateer, though the greatest consequence, but the consul of New York had given his declaration, under oath, and to prove by witnesses, that this powder had been taken from on board La Semillante, and made part of her equipment. Mr. Harrison did not yield to this evidence. However, the three cases were hung; but the yellow fever, which took place at New York, spun them out to a considerable length. The judgment of the district court was not given till November. In the mean time, an express, which Captain Berard had sent to St. Domingo on the first arrest of his prize, had returned with papers, in the most convincing manner, that the Vengeance (Vengeur) had arrived at Port de Paix without any armament or equipment whatever; and that she had been sold, armed, and equipped, wholly, and commissioned as a privateer, on the territory of the republic. These documents were certificates of the general, the ordonnateur, and of the greater part of the principal officers of St. Domingo; the accounts of armament attested by all the providential governments, and the most authentic files. The undersigned hastened to communicate these documents to the Secretary of State of the United States, and to request that he would order the attorney of the New York district to stay the proceedings he had instituted in the name of the Government, as there was nothing done with them, and Mr. Harrison confirmed his prosecution.

In fine, the moment came when it was necessary. They were about to arrest the district court of New York; the privateer was acquitted of the charge of illegally arming, and the prize adjudged to the captor. Mr. Harrison did not appeal as to the privateer; but the cause of the prize was carried to the circuit court, and finally to the supreme court, and these two tribunals confirmed the sentence of the district court.

As to the exportation, the judge was of opinion that the vessel should be condemned for it, and grounded his sentence only on the article of twenty muskets. Some of the attorneys for the privateer had considered it as of so little consequence, that they had not conceived it would be brought in question, and had omitted to speak of it in their pleadings. Mr. Lee was of opinion that the consuls of New York was the appellants, and required, agreeable to a law of Congress, that the vessel should be given up to him, under security, during the appeal: but he could not obtain it; the vessel was sold for less than a tenth part of the cost of her armament; and the money was deposited in the supreme court.

The circuit court, as was expected, set aside the sentence which condemned the privateer; but Mr. Harrison, not content with all he had hitherto done, immediately appealed to the supreme court of the United States, which was not more favorable to him, and confirmed the sentence of the circuit court. The Government, notwithstanding the representations of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, took a decided part in the appeal, and gave its order to Mr. Lee, the attorney general, to argue, which he did with much eloquence, but with the success such a cause merited.

FRANCE.

In the affair of the Princesse des Asturias, at New York, as will be seen hereafter, only two cannon and a score of fuseses were in question.

The vessels had been arrested under still more frivolous pretexts. The privateer La Parisienne had infringed a revenue law of the United States; she was seized and condemned by the district court. This tribunal, doubtless agreeable to rules prescribed by the law, had restored this vessel to her owners, on making them pay her value. The same tribunal, the circuit court, two centuries since, had condemned a vessel of La Serenissime of course sent into Charleston and the other into Savannah. They were both arrested at the instance of the English consul, under the pretext that the tribunal had acted illegally, by restoring the confiscated privateer; that, notwithstanding this restitution, and the payment of her value to the treasurer, she had been condemned by a court of justice. This frivolous assertion was seriously opposed in the district and circuit courts, and in the Supreme Court of the United States; at the close of the proceedings, which lasted nearly two years, the prizes were adjudged to the captors, but without allowing them damages.

In like manner, a vision of prizes of war, and numerous complaints of the French privateers La Mere Michelle, Le Brutus, Le General Laveux, and Le Vengeur. The captors have gained their causes in three courts, and have not obtained damages.

It was necessary to cite here all the vexations proceedings commenced against French vessels, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary would not have written. He contents himself with adding to what he has just said, the affair of the Vengeance and that of the Cassius.

Affair of the Vengeance.

At the beginning of 1794, the predecessor of the undersigned charged the captain of La Dorade, a French galliot, with a particular mission for St. Domingo. He ordered him to go to New York with his galliot, to take some powder which was at Sandy Hook on board the frigate La Semillante, belonging to the republic, and which made part of his equipment, and to carry them to General Laveux. This vessel had formerly been armed for war; she had been built with port holes; consequently she attracted the particular attention of the Government. Many difficulties were thrown in her way; but finally, after having submitted to all the requisite inspections, she sailed, with a for- mer Spanish frigate, La Illusione. She made a voyage to Jamaica, where the master, having surrendered himself of his mission, and thence to Port de Paix, where the powder was delivered to General Laveux. At that place this galliot was sold to an inhabitant of St. Domingo, who armed her, equipped her completely, partly at his own expense, partly at that of the Government, and gave her the name of La Vengeance. The vessel was taken by the privateer Galliot, who sailed from St. Domingo with a commission in good form, and a crew entirely French, to cruise against the enemies of the republic. A few days after her departure, she captured a Spanish vessel called the Princesse des Asturias, laden with a rich cargo, and carried her into the port of New York, in the summer of 1793. This intelligence was seen by him the 5th of October, when the prize was arrested, under the pretext that the privateer had been armed in the United States; and we saw officers of the Government appear to defend his arrest—Mr. Harrison, attorney of the port of New York, and Mr. Trussell, clerk of the district court. In the course of the business which appertained to the decision of the cause. It was under these auspices that the prize was arrested, and the captain of the privateer saw himself obliged to defend her against the allegation of a pretended armament: but it was not sufficient to have arrested the prize; they must also attack the privateer. This did not fail to happen. Shortly after, Mr. Harrison, without laying aside his office of attorney for the captured, but acting in this instance as the same attorney, some time after, the two other causes being still pending, exhibited a second information against the privateer, and had her arrested anew, for having exported arms in violation of a law of the United States, which was in force when the Vengeance sailed from New York. This information was made on the simple declaration of Mr. Giles, marshal of the court, who, as informer, was to share part of the confiscation. So that all the officers of the district court (except the judges) were interested in the condemnation of the privateer or her prize. It is well to observe that, during the course of the process, the monies arising from the sale of the prize were deposited in the hands of the clerk, (attorney for the United States,) and were paid over to the hands of the informer, after the conclusion of the con- confiscation.) So that their interest was to spin out these causes by means of appeal; and so it has happened.

As this last information is here principally in question, it is proper to enter into some details on the subject. It appeared in the allegation, that the privateer had exported from the United States two cannon, twenty muskets, and fifty barrels of powder.

Two cannon and twenty muskets could scarcely be an object of commercial speculation. The existence of the cannon has never been proved, and, certainly, whatever muskets were found on board, were only for the defence of officers of the American Government. The power of a few guns in the possession of a privateer, though the greatest consequence, but the consul of New York had given his declaration, under oath, and to prove by witnesses, that this powder had been taken from on board La Semillante, and made part of her equipment. Mr. Harrison did not yield to this evidence.

However, the three cases were hung; but the yellow fever, which took place at New York, spun them out to a considerable length. The judgment of the district court was not given till November. In the mean time, an express, which Captain Berard had sent to St. Domingo on the first arrest of his prize, had returned with papers, in the most convincing manner, that the Vengeance (Vengeur) had arrived at Port de Paix without any armament or equipment whatever; and that she had been sold, armed, and equipped, wholly, and commissioned as a privateer, on the territory of the republic. These documents were certificates of the general, the ordonnateur, and of the greater part of the principal officers of St. Domingo; the accounts of armament attested by all the pro- vidence governments, and the most authentic files.

The undersigned hastened to communicate these documents to the Secretary of State of the United States, and to request that he would order the attorney of the New York district to stay the proceedings he had instituted in the name of the Government, as there was nothing done with them, and Mr. Harrison confirmed his prosecution.

In fine, the moment came when it was necessary. They were about to arrest the district court of New York; the privateer was acquitted of the charge of illegally arming, and the prize adjudged to the captor. Mr. Harrison did not appeal as to the privateer; but the cause of the prize was carried to the circuit court, and finally to the supreme court, and these two tribunals confirmed the sentence of the district court.

As to the exportation, the judge was of opinion that the vessel should be condemned for it, and grounded his sentence only on the article of twenty muskets. Some of the attorneys for the privateer had considered it as of so little consequence, that they had not conceived it would be brought in question, and had omitted to speak of it in their pleadings. Mr. Lee was of opinion that the consuls of New York was the appellants, and required, agreeable to a law of Congress, that the vessel should be given up to him, under security, during the appeal: but he could not obtain it; the vessel was sold for less than a tenth part of the cost of her armament; and the money was deposited in the supreme court, as the conclusion of the cause.

The circuit court, as was expected, set aside the sentence which condemned the privateer; but Mr. Harrison, not content with all he had hither-to done, immediately appealed to the supreme court of the United States, which was not more favorable to him, and confirmed the sentence of the circuit court. The Government, notwithstanding the representations of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, took a decided part in the appeal, and gave its order to Mr. Lee, the attorney general, to argue, which he did with much eloquence, but with the success such a cause merited.
Affair of the Cassius.

In the month of Thermidor, of the 5th year, (August, 1795) the corvette Le Cassius, belonging to the republic, commanded by Captain Davis, and sent by General Laveaux to the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, on a particular mission requiring her immediate return to St. Domingo, was seized in virtue of an order from the district court of the United States for the State of Pennsylvania, and her captain was arrested at the suit of a merchant of Philadelphia; the latter having been authorized for a pretended illegal capture made in virtue of his commission, and out of the jurisdiction of the United States.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary complained of this violation of the treaties and of the law of nations, and of the necessity to demand from the United States the immediate repatriation of the corvette Le Cassius.

He conceived himself so much the more grounded in his request, as he knew that a like interposition was not new in the annals of the United States; as he knew that the Executive power of the State of Pennsylvania had intervened in a similar case, and in the same manner, in favor of the State of Virginia; and as this measure, dictated by a profound knowledge of the law of nations, and by the reciprocal duties of nations, approved and ratified by the tribunals, organs of the law.* But Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States, replied to the undersigned, on the 19th of August, 1795, "as long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them.

But the undersigned, proceeding, on the 1st Fructidor, in the third year, (18th August, 1795) expressed himself in these terms: "I do not know, nor ought I to know, any other than the Government of the United States; I cannot, under any shape, admit the competency of your tribunals in the different circumstances which arise on the execution or in execution of the treaties. If these tribunals are the first to violate them, I can only address myself to the Government for reparation of that violation; otherwise it would be to render the agents of the French Government, the French Government itself, amenable to these tribunals; which would be to reverse principles." Informed that the Cassius and her captain might be liberated on giving security, the undersigned requested, by the same letter, that the Government of the United States would itself furnish this security and knowing that the Supreme Court of the United States, which was then in session, had the power in certain cases of arresting the proceedings of the inferior courts, on signing them to a prohibition, he suggested to the secretary to adopt this sure and prompt method to put an end to these capricious proceedings. In consequence, the undersigned addressed himself to the supreme tribunal, requested the prohibition, and obtained it. The district court was enjoined immediately to stop the proceedings which had been commenced, and to liberate Captain Davis and his vessel.

But at the very instant in which the marshal was desired to execute the order of the supreme court, he had already received, by an order from the district tribunal, the information that the vessel had been seized at the charge of an English merchant and naturalized American, stating that this vessel had been formerly armed in the United States; and consequently requested that she should be confiscated, one moiety to himself, the other moiety to the United States. The undersigned minister was satisfied whether the vessel was an vessel of the United States; he was even assured that some individuals had only attempted to put on board arms and ammunition, and which they were prevented from doing at the time; but he takes upon him to affirm, that since this vessel has become the property of the French republic, General Laveaux armed and equipped her wholly at St. Domingo, and that at her arrival here, she had not a cannon put on board her in the territory of France. This new order was signed by one of the judges of the supreme court, (in quality of circuit judge) who having ordered the prohibition in the first instance, must have known very well that this vessel was the property of the French republic; and who must also have known that the circuit court was not competent to this proceeding; and consequently it was an instant response of that court. The undersigned minister then sat but once a year at Philadelphia; his, yet distant session, was to be at Yorktown, and the prosecutor had adopted a roundabout mode to take away every means from the French republic of obtaining restitution of her vessel legally, before the expiration of near a year. In the interval, she was rot at the quays of Philadelphia. This has taken place.

The undersigned, from a spirit of conciliation, made an useless attempt with one of the judges of the circuit court to obtain the liberation of the vessel, on giving security; the reply was, that the judge did nothing of himself; that the court, when assemblable, could alone determine.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary made new representations to the Secretary of State of the United States upon the foregoing facts. Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, in his answer of 1st August, says, 1795, repeats this phrase of Mr. Randolph: "As long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them;" adding thereto this remarkable expression: "But, and, therefore, is not chargeable with suffering a vessel of the United States to be taken by the French, and appropriated to his use."* Consequently, the undersigned minister had recourse against the Cassius had been carried to an incompetent tribunal, and in the same letter of 1st August, 1795, the Secretary of State replied on this head to the undersigned, "the counsel who have told you that such is the law, have led you, etc., a miserable and incompetent to the Supreme Court.

The undersigned minister, in these circumstances, saw himself obliged to disarm the vessel; to discharge the crew, which, during these transactions, he had supported, at great expense, and abandoned the Cassius to the Government of the United States, protesting against the illegality of her arrest.

This minister is not at all acquainted with the magnitude of the damage which has happened since that time relative to this affair; he only knows that, in the month of October last, the district court declared itself incompetent, notwithstanding the assertion of the Secretary of State, and quashed all the proceedings. In consequence, the Secretary offered him the Cassius as if, on leaving retained, on the grounds of treaties, a State vessel, after having left to the Government of the United States not to answer both for the violation of the treaties, and for the damages the Cassius has sustained.

(No. 5.) The Secretary of State, by his public letter of the 1st November last, in answer to the note of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, of the 6th of Brumaire last, appears not to have understood either that note or the decree of the executive directory of the 14th November, 1793, of the杰斐逊政府.

This decree does not simply contain the order for seizing English property on board of neutral vessels, and of course on board of American vessels; it orders that the vessels of the republic shall act towards neutrals in the same manner as neutrals shall act towards them.

This decree consequently implies, not only the seizure of enemies' property on board of American vessels, against the principle, free ships make free goods—a principle the American Government abandoned, after having recognized it by accepting the declaration of Russia in 1790; not only the justice of articles classed as contraband in the treaty concluded with Great Britain, July 24th, by the treaty of 1787, but also reprisals for all vexations, contrary to the law of nations and to the treaties, which the Americans shall endure on the part of the English, without an efficacious opposition.

The Secretary of State has been pleased to observe, that France and the United States, by a reciprocal treaty, had engaged to make free ships, make free goods; and consequently accomplished the list of articles seizable as contraband. Upon this basis he built reasoning which he might have spared if he had been pleased to remember the 2d article of the treaty of 1778.

The undersigned minister has also been pleased to reply in part to the note of the undersigned minister plenipotentiary, dated 6th Brumaire, relative to the press exercised on the American sailors, that the Federal Government were not to give an account to any nation of the measures it takes for the protection of its citizens. If such an answer required a reply, the undersigned minister plenipotentiary would request the Secretary of State to observe, that the 4th and 5th, and 8th and 9th articles of the treaty there referred to, was not at all to know the steps taken by the Federal Government, for the protection of its citizens but the measures pursued by it for protecting its citizens from increasing the maritime forces of the enemies of the French republic, its ally.

FRANCE.

is evident that, in this case, the Federal Government should give an account, and that the French republic would have a right to regard its silence as a tacit consent to that measure, and a real hostility.

The undersigned minister plenipotentiary can no longer be suspected of having demanded of the Government of the United States explanations foreign to the relations which exist between that Government and the French republic. It is to the French Government, in his letter of 7th Vendémiaire in the fourth year since, after the passage cited by the Secretary of State, is the following paragraph: "But I am convinced it will not be so."

It is in this conviction that I have written you this letter, persuaded that it is perhaps superfluous to address you to these rejections. I do not doubt but the American Government will prove to all Europe the intention it has of doing justice in regard to the belligerent Powers that it will oblige England to violate no longer the rights of nations, and that it will not henceforward reduce France to the pain of addressing new claims upon this subject."

(No. 6.) In the General Advertiser, published at Philadelphia, on the 9th of June, 1794, may be seen the questions proposed by the President on the 14th of April, 1793, to the Heads of the Departments. The undersigned minister plenipotentiary has there an extract:

1. Shall a minister from the republic of France be received?

2. If received, shall it be absolutely or with qualifications; and, if with qualifications, of what kind?

3. Are the United States obliged, by good faith, to consist with the French government, as applying to the present situation of the parties; may they either renounce them, or hold them suspended till the Government of France shall be established?

4. Should the future regent of France send a minister to the United States, ought he to be received?

5. The French Government, jealous of giving to the United States proofs of its attachment, had communicated negotiations with the regency of Algiers, in order to put an end to the war which that Power was making on the commerce of the United States. The Minister for Foreign Affairs, by a letter of the 5th of January, 1794, instructed the predecessor of the undersigned to communicate to the Federal Government the steps which the regency of Algiers, in consequence of the undersigned, wrote to the Secretary of State, on the 16th Prairial in the second year, the following letter: "I have already had the pleasure, sir, to inform you, verbally, of the interest which the committee of public safety of the National Convention had, in due season, taken, in the truly unhappy situation of your commerce in the Mediterranean. The French Government, by calling from your recollections, in writing, the steps which are to be taken by our agent with the Dey of Algiers, for repressing this new manœuvre of the British administration, which has put the finishing stroke to its proofs of malevolence towards free people. The despatch of this letter was written on the 1st of January, and did not come to my hands till fifteen days ago. I do not yet know by what route. I could have with more certainty been less, that I might sooner have fulfilled the agreeable task of proving to you, by facts, the protestations of friendship, which I have so often spoken in the name of the republic of France. This, as I should receive from Europe in a little while, will doubtless possess me of the success of those negotiations which were to have been opened in January last. If the situation of your affairs is yet such, with respect to that barbarous regency, as that our intervention may be of some utility, I pray you to invite the President to cause to be communicated to me the means that he will join to those of the committee of public safety, for the treatment of that affair. I have the honor to sign of the President some communication on this subject. I shall be satisfied to be able to transmit it by a very early conveyance, which I am now preparing for France."

The Secretary of State replied to him on the 6th of June, 1794, by a letter, of which the following is an extract:

"Your other letter, of the 4th of June, is a powerful demonstration of the interest which the republic of France takes in our cause, and our measures. It is to me a source of the greatest satisfaction, to know, that, as you will so soon receive the detail of those measures, which your Government have pursued in our behalf, and after the rising of Congress some new arrangement will probably be adopted by the Executive, it will be better, perhaps, to postpone our interview on this matter until the intelligence, which you further expect, shall arrive."

Then Mr. Jay was charged to negotiate with the British Government, and the citizen Fauchet did not afterwards receive any communication on the subject.

(No. 8.) On the 13th Floréal, in the third year of the republic, (3d of May, 1794) the predecessor of the undersigned minister declared in person to the Secretary of State, upon the blockade of the French colonies:

"After so many useless attempts, sir, you must be sensible of the pain I experience in tracing this picture, so different from that the which the French republic gives whenever justice towards you is in question, even though her eyes may be closed. It was incessantly claimed, even in the last treaty, that she would always respect your treaties with your in this instance she demands but justice, and cannot obtain it. On the contrary, she sees her enemies admitted to an intimacy with you, at the moment in which your commerce and your sovereignty are insulted by them; at the moment when, adding derision to injustice, they despoil you upon the seas, when they promise to indemnify you for former acts. This reflection teaches me to collect this information for the future, when we shall postured under your eyes the official legalization of a proclamation, which prohibits your commerce with our colonies, and suspends to you alone the law of nations. I know, sir, what respect imposes on me as to what immediately interests your affairs, and your relations as a people; but I cannot entirely pass in silence transactions to which the republic is no stranger, because they are directed against her and that, to subscribe by an excess of courtesy to such orders, were to quit the neutral position which the Americans profess. Examine, I pray you, sir, whether this can be an existence; when, on the one hand, you can no longer maintain your treaties, and, on the other, you are obliged to abandon a commerce so exclusively to the nations of the West Indies, which will soon declare all the universe blockaded, except her possessions. What account do you conceive I can render to the French Government of the means you take for rendering your neutrality respectable? Yet, on that, my sir, it is impossible to remain silent on it in such a case, especially that France is uneasy."

The Secretary of State replied, on the 29th of May, 1795, to this passage of citizen Fauchet's letter, in the following manner:

"The predication of a neutral nation is always peculiar and delicate, and eminently so while it defends itself against charges of partiality from one of the warring Powers, lest it should palliate the misdoings of another. But I infer from the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is assented to. We did read, on the 10th of April, 1795, a publication from His Britannic Majesty's consul-general for the Middle and Southern States of America, giving public notice that he had received official communications that the islands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, and Desirade, were, by proclamation, issued by His Britannic Majesty's government in the West Indies, blockaded, and that all vessels sent to, or traded with, blockaded; and that neutral vessels were, by that proclamation, prohibited from attempting to enter any of the ports or places of the said islands with provisions or supplies of any nature or kind whatsoever, under the penalty of being seized and warehoused, if not otherwise warranted by the established laws of nations. So highly valued has the West India commerce always been, that this exclusion was often revoked in the interest of trade. It was acknowledged that neutrals are interdicted by the law of nations from a blockaded port. From some quarter or other the blockade must be notified, or else neutrals would be a constant unsuspecting prey, not being in a condition to collect this information for themselves. But, who are the military investment of a place? Surely not the besieged, but the besiegers, whether we consult principle or practice. The check which neutrals have upon a wanton and false parade of a siege is the same with the check upon any other groundless presence. We might, indeed, have remonstrated, but with what color may well be imagined, when this Department was unprovided with any document upon which the rescinding of that edict could have been urged. If rumor were a fit guide, who can pronounce on which side rumor preponderated, when stripped of the exaggerations which a host of passions had gathered together? We had, it may be said, one effort remaining, which was to promulge to the citizens of the United States that the proclamation was null and void as to them. If, after this defiance of that act, any American vessel had risked, and incurred confiscation, the Government would have been importuned for something more than the general protection, which is the birthright of all our citizens. The clamor would have been for special indemnity, and in a closed and secret manner.

(No. 9.) The citizen Genet, one of the predecessors of the undersigned, notified the Secretary of State, on the 23d of May, 1793, that he was empowered to renew the existing treaties between the French republic and the United States. The Secretary of State replied to him that the Senate not being assembled, it was impossible to meet his overtures, because that body were, according to the constitution, to participate in the consummation of treaties.*

On the 30th of September, 1793, citizen Genet renewed the subject; the Secretary of State, in acknowledging the receipt of that letter, informed him that he had laid it before the President, and that it will be taken into consideration with all the respect and interest that such an object requires.

The Senate assembled, and the treaty was never again brought in question.

The predecessor of the undersigned, in his verbal communications with the Secretary of State, expressed the desire which he had in renewing her treaties. He had only evasive answer from the Federal Government, charged to prepare, with the Federal Government, the plan of a new treaty of commerce, communicated to the Secretary of State, on the 30th June, 1795, (O. S.) that part of his instructions which authorized him to open this negotiation.

On this subject the President communicated to the Secretary of State, who explained to the undersigned the manner in which they could proceed in it. But at what time? When the ratification of the treaty concluded between Lord Grenville and Mr. Jay no longer permitted the undersigned to pursue that negotiation.

NO. 9.

Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9th Fructidor, (August 26, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have informed you, several times, of the numberless vexations which our privateers are made to experience at the instigation of English agents; this persecution, far from diminishing, becomes intolerable. I have used all the means in my power to prevent armaments in the United States; no commission has been granted since my arrival, and you may be assured that none will be given, without the energy, the rights of those who have been legally armed and commissioned. I believe I cannot better succeed in my means of defense than by addressing myself to a just and free Government, to prevent the animosity of these subaltern agents, against all the French who make prizes upon our combined enemies. I am possessed of a great number of complaints against those unjust and odious proceedings. I wait for certain information that I may submit them to the justice and impartiality of the Government, which I believe is tenacious in the execution of its treaties, and in disavowing all those miserable subtilties—al those miserable chicaneries, shamefully employed to damp the courage of the mariners of the French republic. In the mean time, sir, I send you a picture which, without doubt, will be as affecting to you as it is to myself. I pray you to cause orders to be given to the officers of the customs at Newport, to restore to the agent of the republic, the prize made by the privateer Sans Pareil. Without informing the consuls, without adhering more to the laws of fidelity than to those of equity, this prize has been taken; the privateer Sans Pareil had been armed in the ports of the United States. If this pretext had been really alleged, a more glaring injustice and more palpable falsehood could not have been disproved; but, perhaps, (as I may be permitted to suppose, after such conduct) they have only wished to gain time; but, perhaps, as frequently happens, they have only wished to discourage and fatigue the captors, by adjourning the prize, from the length of time required for obtaining the decision, which they will retard by a thousand unfair expedients. In this case, sir, it is at length time to take a determination which will secure the interests of the captor, who, without this precaution, will be always injured, whatever may be the determination of the courts they will be affected, first by the loss of time, secondly, by the expenses in procuring this indeed, it was wounded vessels which they shall have taken. This reflection, dictated by justice, reminds me that a letter I wrote to you, requesting indemnity for the ship William, which has been suffered to decay in the port of Philadelphia upwards of a year, for the want of a decision, remains without an answer. I am inclined to believe, notwithstanding your silence, that you have taken my request into consideration; I will go farther, and say that I am sure it has been as favorably received as it is just. The one I now make is not less so, sir, and I calculate upon an answer as prompt as favorable.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, 5th September, 1794.

Sir: I have urged the Governor of Rhode Island to report, without delay, the case of the prize taken by the privateer Sans Pareil. Be assured, sir, that no doubt is entertained of your determination to discountenance illicit privateering, and that the Government of the United States will not suffer the acquisitions of the French privateers to be wrested from them, without adequate cause; nor yet, that they should be wantonly vexed by unjust detentions. I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, September 3, 1794.

Sir: It being represented that the Perseverance, a prize to the French privateer Sans Pareil, is detained at Newport in your excellency's order, with a view to institute an inquiry into the legality of the privateer, and, consequently, of the prize, I have requested you, sir, as soon as may be, to transmit to me the circumstances of the case. I have now before me a letter from the French minister, who expresses great anxiety lest delay should take place in the settlement of cases like the present, and the arduous of French privateers be damaged by the vexations which a seizure of their prizes may produce.

No. 13.
Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, 30th Vendémiaire, (17th October, 1794, O. S.)

Sir: I conceive how painful it must be to you to observe me recurring so often to the same questions, and speaking to you so frequently on the same affairs; but persuaded that it is not less so to me, to have daily new motives of complaint against the abuse made of the laws, in order to persecute our privateers.

You announce to me that the Perseverance, prize to the Sans Pareil, had been delivered to the captors by order of the Governor of Rhode Island; in contempt of that decision the English agents have just created new difficulties; a new decision is still expected to take place on the first Monday of November. It is impossible, sir, for this state of things to continue much longer. You are sensible how necessary it will be to retract from our treaty the article which specifically permits the ships of war of the two nations to conduct to, and sell their prizes in, their respective ports, should this right become illusory and void by the difficulty thrown in the way of its execution. I proposed a method as simple as it is just, for putting an end to this tyrannical chicanery: this method was, to require security from those who prosecuted prizes as illegal. Were this measure adopted, it would render our enemies less ingenious in their proceedings, and prevent them from bringing so many actions; of the injustice of which they themselves are convinced.

Your silence led me to presume that you were of opinion with me on this point. I am undeceived by the recent complaints which crowd upon me from all parts; I expect, sir, that the Federal Government will put an end to these pernicious practices I have proposed, or by any other which wisdom may suggest.

Permit me, sir, to call to your attention, at the same time, the outrage committed on board the Favorite by men clothed in American uniform. Among the arms which they have pillaged, there are some of which the republic stand in great need. I hope that fines will not add to the crime already committed, delays injurious to the interests of the French republic, outraged by an act so contrary to the law of nations and to treaties.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

No. 14.
Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, October 22, 1794.

Sir: I received your letter of the 17th inst, remonstrating against the vexations which your cruisers are said to experience, with the most unqualified wishes that we were always able to administer immediate relief. But the extent of the United States imposes the necessity of substituting the agency of the Governors in the place of an instantaneous action in the Federal Executive, and therefore general rules alone can be provided.

Under these rules, formed in the last year, the Governor of Rhode Island operated on the prize of the Sans Pareil, and discharged her. If, however, individuals conceive that they have a legal claim upon her, and draw her before a court of law, the Executive of the United States cannot forbid them. The plea, under the treaty, that the court has no cognizance of French prizes, will be admitted if it applies, and the person by whom the process is instituted will be liable to a judgment for costs and damages, if he fails in his proof.

The bond, which you propose as a security against vexation, we have no power to demand, because the Executive do not mean to interfere, without presumptive proof of title; and this presumption, when established, would seem to be a sufficient protection against being harassed. The courts have their forms, founded on similar precautions. Knowing that this was the situation of our laws, I am not authorized to make the arrangement proposed.

However, I will do every thing which can be done with propriety; and that is contained in the letter of which I have the honor of sending you a copy.

Papers respecting the Favorite were received this morning from New York, and copies of them are now transmitted to you.

I have the honor, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

CIRCULAR.

The Secretary of State to the Governors of the several States.

PHILADELPHIA, October 22, 1794.

Sir: It gives me pain to inform your excellency that Mr. Fauchet, the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, believes that he has reason to complain of the treatment which French prizes have too often received in our ports.

He represents that, by the machinations of the enemies of his country, the captors are harassed by seizures, arrests, and detentions, the most vexations and cruel; that as soon as the claimants are foiled in one attempt, they take themselves to another. On this part, as well as in the conduct which the President reposes in the executives of the States, they have been requested to fail the general rules laid down by him, I could only undertake to address your excellency upon the subject.

Mr. Fauchet is anxious that a bond should be given by the claimants before the executives shall interpose in any case of a prize. Doubting the legality and expediency of this suggestion, I have it not in my power to recommend it. But I have assured him that none of the chief magistrates of the States will ever interfere, without a strong presumption of title. A late circumstance has, however, brought to view the practicability of oppression, unless precautions be adopted by the executives. The claimants may often pursue a double chance, by first procuring a trial before the Governors, and, if defeated, by next resorting to the courts of law. It is desirable, therefore, that when-sever an application shall be made to your excellency, with respect to a prize, you should cause it to be examined well, whether the courts have jurisdiction to inquire into the affair. If they have, then it seems proper that your excellency should not interpose. If the courts have not jurisdiction, and you are convinced that there is good ground for detaining the prize, in order to comply with the rules established by the President last year, then, and then only, your excellency will so proceed. By these means, the vexation complained of will be avoided, as far as is practicable, and the service rendered to the said claimants by constructing the said treaty will be left to the judiciary, who are more particularly the expositors of it. By these means, also, the article of that treaty will be best preserved from violation, and the honor of our nation sustained.

But nothing which I have now taken the liberty of offering to your excellency’s consideration is intended to change the succour which, at any time, you may find it necessary to give to the officers charged with the execution of legal process. I have the honor to be, &c.

UNITED STATES, &c.

In the Supreme Court of the United States.

Alexander S. Glass and others, Appellants,

The sloop Betsey and cargo, &c. and Pierre Arcade J ohnannene, Appellee.

At a Supreme Court of the United States, held at Philadelphia, the same being the present seat of the National Government, on Saturday, the eighth day of February, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, before the Honorable John Jay, Esq., Chief Justice, and the Honorable William Cushing, James Wilson, John Blair, and William Patterson, Esquires, Associate Justices of the said court, came the parties, as well appellants as appellee, in the above appeal, by their respective advocates, and after full hearing of all and singular the matters and things in controversy set forth and contained in the record and minutes of the proceedings in the said appeal, as well of the circuit court for the Maryland district as of the district court for the said district, and solemn argument being heard thereon by the said advocates; the said Supreme Court, sitting and adjourning from day to day, until the 18th day of February instant, took the same into consideration, and held the same under advisement until the 17th May of the same year, after adjournment.

At which day the said Supreme Court of the United States being met, and the advocates aforesaid attending, the court proceeded to the publication of their final sentence or decree, which, being read and filed, is in the words following, to wit:

This court being decidedly of opinion that every district court in the United States possesses all the powers of a court of admiralty, whether considered as an instance or as a prize court, and that the plea of the aforesaid appellee, Pierre Arcade Johannene, to the jurisdiction of the district court of Maryland, is insufficient; therefore, it is considered by the Supreme Court aforesaid, and now finally decreed and adjudged by the same, that the said plea be, and the same is hereby, overruled and dismissed, and that the decree of the said district court of Maryland, founded thereon, be, and the same is hereby, revoked, reversed, and annulled.

And the said Supreme Court, being fully and completely satisfied that the district court of Maryland has jurisdiction in the case, and has to decide whether, in the present case, restitution ought to be made to the claimants, or either of them, in whole, or in part, that is, whether such restitution can be made, consistently with the laws of the Union, the treaties and laws of the United States; therefore, it is ordered and adjudged that the said district court of Maryland do proceed to determine upon the libel of the said Alexander S. Glass, and others, agreeably to law and right, the said plea to the jurisdiction of the said court notwithstanding.

And the said Supreme Court being further of opinion that no foreign Power can, of right, institute or erect any court of judicature, of any kind, within the jurisdiction of the United States, but such only as may be warranted by, and in pursuance of, treaties it is, therefore, decreed and adjudged, that the admiralty jurisdiction, which has been exercised in the United States by the consuls of France, not being warranted, is not of right.

It is further ordered by the said Supreme Court, that this cause be, and it hereby, remanded to the district court for the Maryland district, for a final decision, and that the several parties to the same do each pay their own costs.

No. 17.

Joseph Fanchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 27th Fructidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (18th Sept. 1794.)

Sir: I am about to lay before you an affair, which I have often mentioned to you in conversation. I could have wished that it was possible to present you, at the same time, an account of the vexations of which I complained in my letter of the 9th Fructidor,* and of which Charleston has been the principal scene. It is painful to me to be obliged to recur to objects of such a nature; but I could delay no longer to communicate to you the facts which shall constitute the subject of this letter, and on which I think it my duty to claim the speedy justice and good offices of the Federal Government.

The French privateer L’Ami de la Pointe à Petre, Captain William Talbot, commissioned at Goudauppe, near the island of Cuixa, a Dutch brigantine called l’Amour Christiane, Magazine. This vessel had been originally captured by a French armed vessel, called l’Amour de la Liberté, but having been met with, and visited by L’Ami de la Pointe à Petre, and the prize master, who had been put on board by the first capitor, not being able to produce a commission, the latter manned her and brought her to Charleston. Having arrived at that port, Capt. Talbot was arrested, at the suit of the Dutch captain, and deprived of his prize, to the amount of fourteen thousand dollars, was demanded from him for his liberty. Proceedings were immediately instituted against the captors in the court of admiralty, and, notwithstanding the representations of the French consul, notwithstanding the documents furnished in favor of Talbot, and with so much success as you still will soon see, were not of a nature to be refused, the prize was adjudged illegal, and restored to the claimants. I could have wished, sir, to have it in my power to send you a formal copy of the decree pronounced by the court; but if the enclosed extract from the Gazette of Charleston may be deemed sufficient information, it appears that the sentence was grounded on the illegality of the ship in the capturing vessels, on Captain Talbot’s being a citizen of the United States, and his vessel armed at Charleston.

On the first point I will observe, that L’Ami de la Pointe à Petre should have been considered as the only legitimate capitor, the schooner L’Amour de la Liberté not having any right, and her existence as a vessel armed for a cruise being absolutely out of my knowledge: that it was by address that the claimants instituted an action, on the ground of the illegality of this first capitor; that intrigue suppressed the just representations which Talbot might have substantiated, and confounded him with the other. I will add, sir, that, as soon as I was informed of the manner in which L’Amour de la Liberté had been armed and commissioned, I sent pressing orders to Charleston to do justice on the occasion, deeming, thereby, to give your Government a new proof of the fidelity with which we keep our promises.

* August 26, 1794.
To illustrate the second point, I enclose, sir, a copy of the oath which citizen Talbot took to the French republic, before the municipality of Pointe à Petre, an oath which assures to him the rights of a French citizen, which, agreeably to the laws of your country, he had a right to take, and in virtue of which I find myself obliged to maintain him in the exercise of it. I send you at the same time, a copy of the commission which he obtained from citizen Collot, then Governor of Guadaloupe. You will thereby see that the vessel which he commands is French property, belonging to citizen Samuel Riddick, of Pointe à Petre. These documents, sir, which were officially communicated to me by the consul of Charleston, are the same which were produced in support of Talbot's claims. I have reason to be very much surprised that their validity should appear to have been drawn in question by the judge of the court of admiralty. Acts passed by a French municipality, or delivered by French public officers, acknowledged as such, ought not to have been submitted to the control of the American courts, and it is, without doubt, in consequence of a mistake in the form of the proceedings, that the matter has been decided against us, in the said account, that the affair presents such an aspect. The point to be decided appears to be, whether Talbot had, or had not, a right to become a Frenchman, on renouncing the protection of the United States. Whether his vessel had, or had not, been built in the United States, appears to me to be immaterial, since it is proved that the vessel was French property when she was commissioned. Besides, I do not believe that in last December there existed a law to prohibit an American from transporting his property, at his own risk, and disposing of it where, and to whom, he should think proper.

To return, sir, I have just explained to you the vexations to which citizen Talbot has been exposed, as well in his person as his property. I earnestly request you, and I expect it from the justice of the Federal Government, to cause them to cease as soon as possible. As far as the process commenced against him is concerned, I believe that he has appealed, in his own name, to the circuit court, from the sentence pronounced by the admiralty. I know that the Government cannot officially interfere in this business; but would it not be possible to engage the attorney of the district at Charleston to aid Captain Talbot with his good offices to recover, as speedily as possible, a prize which, according to the seventeenth article of our treaty, the L'Ami de la Pointe à Petre, acknowledged to be a French privateer, "has a right to conduct where it pleases, without the officers of the admiralty in the ports or harbors of the United States taking cognizance of the validity of the said prize?"

I cannot close this letter without mentioning to you a circumstance which took place in the suit in question, and which lies heavy at my heart. The chancellor of the consulate at Charleston was summoned to the bar of the court, to contest the suit in question, on my declaration, he having been summoned anew to answer upon points which appeared to the consul foreign to the matter pending in the court, he received an order to testify upon this second demand, agreeably to a citation to the French consul and to his chancellor to appear before the judge of the admiralty, and an order to the marshal of the court to bring with him a copy of the documents demanded, or the documents themselves. I enclose a copy of the summons. Without speaking of the immunities of our consular officers, and of the application of this right to the present case, you will observe, sir, how inconsistent the terms of this paper are with the cordiality which ought to prevail between the people of the two countries. I protest against it, and hope that the Government will so far correct the matter as to advance the cause in a manner, which is befitting the dignity and character of the French nation on similar occasions. I do not doubt, sir, that you will par take of my sensibility in this respect.

Accept, &c.

CHARLESTON, Saturday, August 9, 1794.

Wednesday, in the court of admiralty for this district, the judge pronounced his decree in the long contested cause of the Dutch brigantine the Vrouw Christina Magdalena, captured and brought into this port by the captains Ballard and Talbot.

The libel was on behalf of the captain and owners of the said brigantine, claiming restitution under the 18th and 19th articles of the treaty with the United Netherlands. A plea was entered to the jurisdiction of the court, under the 17th article of the treaty with France, and the 6th section of the act of Congress of the 5th of June last, entitled "An additional act to the punishment of crimes and offenses against the United States." This plea was decided against by Mr. Justice Talbot, as a French citizen, acting under a commission from the Governor of Guadaloupe, and as having taken this vessel out of the possession of Captain Ballard, the original captor, his prize-master producing no commission.

The judge, on considering the arguments in support of the plea to the jurisdiction, overruled the same as irrelevant—

1st. Because the 17th article of the treaty with France contemplates only French vessels of war, or privateers legally appointed.

2d. Because the 6th section of the act of Congress of the 5th of June last, does not lessen the jurisdiction of the district courts in any case of which they had previous cognizance; and the decree of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Glass and others, against the sloop Betsey, &c. having declared that every district court of the United States possesses all the power of an admiralty court, whether considered as an instance or a prize court.

This cause was therefore cognizable therein by the law of nations, and the constitution of the court.

The judge being of opinion that Captain Ballard had acted without any commission authorizing him to cruise or arm for war, and had not even the pretence of being a French citizen; that Captain Talbot having armed his vessel (then an American brig) in an American port, proceeded thence to Guadaloupe for the express purpose, as appeared in evidence, of changing the property, applying for a French commission, obtaining the same within two days after the sale of the vessel, and under color of such commission, having captured the said brigantine Vrouw Christina Magdalena; which acts were deemed contrary to the 19th article of the treaty with the United Netherlands, in what regard the said contract of the treaty with France, as being not within the purview or intention thereof restitution of the vessel and cargo was therefore decreed.

-FRENCH REPUBLIC.—In the name of the French people.

George Henry Victor Collot, major general of the armies of the French republic, Governor of the islands and their dependencies.

In consequence of the declaration of war made against the King of England and the Stadtholder of Holland, agreeably to the proclamation of citizen Rochambeau, commandant general of the Windward Islands, and the hostilities committed in the latitudes of Guadaloupe, and its dependencies, by the ships of the enemy:

We, in virtue of the powers delegated to us, authorize citizen Samuel Riddick, resident at Pointe à Petre, to arms for war, under the command of citizen William Tallbot, the schooner L’Ami de la Pointe à Petre, of the burthen of about sixty tons, to cruise against the enemies of the republic, of whatsoever nation they may be, and to sustain, with the courage and intrepidity of a true republican, the dignity and honor of the national flag.

We enjoin the owner and officers commanding the said schooner, not to permit any pillage of negroes, cattle, moveables, and utensils, of the inhabitants residing upon those enemy consist; religiously to respect the fishermen, their canoes and nets, conformably to the decree of the National Convention, hereby disavowing all violence which may be exercised against the law of nations; and we formally declare that we will compel the restitution of all captures which shall be made contrary to the law of a liberal and generous warfare, which the French republic intends to wage with its enemies.

We equally desire that the prizes which may be made may be conducted, as far as it is practicable, into the ports of Guadaloupe and, if this colony should be attacked, that the said vessel should come to its assistance and make a common cause with it, against the public enemies; and for the fulfillment of the above conditions, citizen Samuel Riddick has given good and sufficient security to the municipality of Pointe à Petre; and the present shall be enrolled in the tribunal of the district of the said town of Pointe à Petre.

Given at Basseterre, Guadaloupe, the 4th of January, 1794, in the third year of the French republic.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 6th Brumaire, (23rd October, 1794, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

I take the liberty of reminding you of the letter which I had the honor to write to you on the 13th of last month (O. S.) on the subject of citizen Tallbot. I have nothing to add to the facts which it contains, unless that it is much to be feared lest the circuit court, before whom the appeal was brought, may pass over, as superficially as the district court, the unquestionable documents which Tallbot exhibits, and lest the matter may become otherwise very complicated, if with this unfavorable issue, the chance of which was foreseen, it should proceed without the interposition of the Government.

Your silence, sir, I must confess, excites my solicitude for the idea you may have formed of the consequences of this decision. They go far beyond the simple fact of prize; and fearing lest they may have escaped you, I must beg you to put me in remembrance of them in a summary form.

The decision already made, and that which is foreseen, implicate at once the treaties, the law of nations, and the fundamental maxims of municipal law.

The validity of a prize is contested notwithstanding the local commission of the captors; notwithstanding the 17th article of our treaty—an article solemly guaranteed by the 2d of the treaty of Holland with you, of which I am astonished that Tallbot's antagonists should be permitted to avail themselves.

The right, which every citizen of a free State possesses, of entering into the service of a foreign nation, and of procuring himself to be naturalized there, is drawn in question; the word pirate has received a definition of a terrible extent. If the decision of the first tribunal is founded in justice, your citizens are villains attached to the soil, your laws follow them to a foreign domain, even though they have renounced them. France, although she has naturalized Sans Culottes, and the schooner les Vainqueurs de la Basille, or a copy of one of them, and, this you may in no wise omit, and also a copy of the marine regulations of France, respecting privateers and prizes.

Witness, the Honorable Thomas Bee, Esq. judge of the said court of admiralty, at Charleston, the seventeenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and in the nineteenth year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States of America.

the station of their armies in our harbors, should be hung, when he should be made a prisoner by the Dutch, the Swedes, or the Prussians.

Finally, an act passed by a French municipality is about to be determined on by the circuit court, notwithstanding the maxim consecrated by universal jurisprudence, that a court ought to acknowledge the acts of a foreign tribunal.

I request, sir, all your attention to this remarkable fact. We are agreed, that the Government of a foreign country cannot be decided upon the political rights of another Government. I ought not to conceal from you, that the commission of Talbot and the validity of the prize would be sustained in France. In proportion as the republic is accommodating with regard to doubtful privileges, she is tenacious of her unquestionable rights, especially when the concession of these would be followed, as in the case in question, by such important consequences.

Accept, sir, my esteem.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, October 28, 1794.

SIR:—Two reasons have prevented an earlier answer to your letter of the 13th ultimo, which was received on the 16th. The first was, that the insurrection at Pittsburg, and the subjects connected with it, incessantly absorbed our attention; and the second, that I was in hopes that a complete copy of the record, duly exemplified, would have been forwarded to you. We should then have been more fully qualified to examine this case, throughout its several stages. For, although what shall come from you will always be treated with the most respectful attention, yet, when the conduct of one of our courts is impeached, there may often be, in a formal statement of its proceedings, at full length, something which may vary the impression arising from a detached part of them. However, as in your letter of yesterday you urge an answer, I now do myself the honor of transmitting it.

1. The necessity of a complete record is demonstrated by your first remark, that the Ami de la Pointe a Petre ought to be considered as the sole lawful captor. This is entirely a matter of fact, and must have depended upon the evidence given.

After this fact was established so as to satisfy the judge, it would seem that he then inquired whether she was a legal privateer. Whether the equipment of the vessel here was with a view to convert her into a privateer at Guadeloupe, it is impossible for us to judge, deprived of the testimony; or whether, if this was the case, she thereby became illegal, is a point of law which, at this stage of the business, the Executive cannot take up. For the principle will be admitted, that the Government to which an individual belongs cannot interfere, in his behalf, for a defect of justice, until the gradation of tribunals shall have been resorted to; and in this channel Captain Talbot seems to be no procedural arrangements: I cannot doubt that Captain Talbot has taken an oath to the French republic; and, at the same time, I acknowledge my belief that no law of any of the States prohibits expatriation. But it is obvious that, to prevent frauds, some rules and ceremonies are necessary for its government. It then becomes a question, which is also an affair of the judiciary, whether those rules and ceremonies have been complied with. Should he prove to be a French citizen, he ought and will be acquitted. Should he prove to be an American citizen, he will be amenable to the laws.

Under these circumstances, you will perceive that it is impracticable for the Executive of the United States to interfere, as yet, at least, so far as regards the foregoing case. For, to interfere would imply that the Executive is satisfied of his being in a situation which enables him to decide on the affair; which is not the case.

The subject of your complaint against the consuls to the consul to produce his papers of office, seems to call upon us to do something. Although any opinion which the Executive may entertain against the propriety of this proceeding cannot constitutionally influence it, yet it is its duty to have it revised by some superior tribunal. I will, therefore, write to the attorney of the district to this effect; and I will, moreover, instruct every attorney of every district to oppose all attempts which shall be made to counteract the consular convention, especially in the immunities of consuls touching their papers of office.

If the established laws of our land will not permit us, at all times, to go the full length of what the representative of the French republic wishes, he will not ascribe the omission to any want of cordiality or friendship to his nation, but to the sovereignty of the law. I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The communications which I have made to you during your present session, from the despatches of our minister in London, contain a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain. But, as peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal, before the last resource—which has so often been the scourge of nations—and cannot fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States—is contemplated, I have thought proper to nominate, and do hereby nominate John Jay, as envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Britannic Majesty. My confidence in our minister plenipotentiary in London continues undiminished; but a mission like this, while it corresponds with the solemnity of the occasion, will announce to the world a solicitude for a friendly adjustment of our complaints, and a receptivity to hospitality. Going immediately from the United States, such an envoy will carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country; and will thus be taught to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity.

Declaration of Edmund Randolph.

JULY 8, 1793.

I never could, with truth, have informed the French minister that the mission, as set forth in the President's message to the Senate, contemplated only an adjustment of our complaints, if by this phrase it be intended to exclude commercial arrangements: I could have had no reason for saying so, since the French republic could have had nothing to do with our commercial arrangements, if they did not derogate from her rights—it could have answered no purpose, when so short a time would develop the contrary—I never did inform the French minister as is above stated.

The only official conversation which I recollect with Mr. Fauchet, upon this subject, was when I communicated to him, with the President's permission, that Mr. Jay was instructed not to weaken our engagements to France. Neither then, nor at any other time, in official or unofficial conversation, did I ever say to him that nothing of a commercial nature was contemplated; or that nothing but the controversies under the old treaty, and the spoliations, were contemplated.

Mr. Fauchet, some time ago, said to me, that he understood, from what I said, that Mr. Jay was not authorized to treat of commercial matters. I told him that he misunderstood me. No letter has ever passed upon this subject.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 12th Messidor, (June 30, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have received the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the United States and Great Britain, of which the President has been pleased that I should be possessed, in order to enable me to make such observations thereon as I might judge proper. This frank measure is to me a sure guarantee of the friendship of the contracting parties to the United States; and of the attention and regard which they entertain for the faithful ally. It is, therefore, with confidence that I am about to submit the reflections to which the reading of the treaty has given birth. They will not be confined merely to the stipulations of that part of the treaty which, contrary to the interests of France, appear to me to destroy the effect of her treaty with the United States.

I shall not speak of the 18th article, which is that suspended. I shall not represent to you how injurious it may be to France and the United States. It necessarily paralyses the commerce of the United States with the French colonies in America. I am the more prepared to see it in this light because I am not aware to which of the contracting parties France can ever make any countries among nations, to which he cannot send in Europe? Is not this an indirect means of preventing the colonies from participating in advantages which the English reserve to themselves? But, sir, this is not the only point upon which I can present observations to you.

The 17th, 18th, 24th, and 25th articles appear to merit great attention, when we compare them with the 23d, 29th, and 17th of our treaty. Indeed, sir, subsequent to the 17th, which states that the contracting parties agree that the respective vessels may be arrested and detained upon just suspicion that they are laden with merchandises belonging to an enemy, or that they are carrying to the enemy, or are contraband of war, &c. is the 18th article describing those articles, and which states: "It is agreed that, under the said denomination, shall be comprised all arms and instruments serving for the purposes of war, by land or sea, such as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, casques, pistols, powder, shot, cannon, musket balls, pike, arrows, powder, shot, cannon, musket balls, pike, arrows, and all other matters which, by the nature of their construction and materials, may be considered as适opable to the purposes of an enemy." The 23d article of the treaty between France and the United States, which secures the liberty of commerce to the citizens of both countries, contains this stipulation: "It is stipulated by the present treaty, that free ships shall be free goods, and that every thing shall be judged free which may be found on board the vessels belonging to the citizens of the contracting parties, if even the local circumstances may make it appear that it is not a mere contraband. The principles in which this is based, that of the injury which might be afterwards suffered, is, however, the only one which can be admitted, it being nevertheless understood that contraband articles shall be always excepted." The 24th article explains the articles of contraband and prohibited merchandises in the following manner: "Under the name of contraband or prohibited merchandises are comprehended cannon, bombs with their fuses, and other things therein belonging, bullets, gunpowder, muskets, powder, matches, pikes, swords, lances, oars, balisters, mortars, petards, grenades, saltpeter, muskets, muskets, halberts, helmets, breast plates, coats of mail, and the like kinds of arms, proper for arming soldiers, musket rests, belts, horses with their furniture, and all other warlike instruments whatever. These merchandises which follow shall hereafter be considered as contraband and prohibited: all the kind of manufactures, as also shirts, trousers, cuirasses, and other apparel, made of cotton, hemp, flax, silk, cotton, or any other material whatever, all kinds of wearing apparel, together with the species whereby they are used to be made, gold and silver, as well coined as uncoined, tin, iron, flett, brass, copper, brass, coal, as also wheat and barley, and any other kind of corn and pulse, tobacco, and likewise all manner of spices, salted and smoked flesh, salted fish, cheeses, wines, and all sorts of salts, as well as in general all provisions which serve for the nourishment of mankind and the sustenance of life; further, all kinds of cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, rope, cables, sails, sail clothes, anchors, and any parts of anchors, also ships' masts, planks, beams, and all the means, of what trees soever, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods whatever, which have not been worked into any instrument or thing, prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reputed contraband, much less such as have been already wrought and made up for any other use; all which shall be reckoned among free goods, as likewise all other merchandises, branches, and parts of branches of manufacture, and particularly all kind of drugs and spices and other such goods; so that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the subjects of both conferates, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places being only excepted, as are at that time besieged, blockaded, or invested."

The law of the 13th Nivose, in the 3d year, secures to the treaties a full execution, and the arrêt of the committee of public safety, dated the 27th of the same month, transmitted to you by Colonel Monroe, bears evidence of the entire execution of the article of our treaty which I have just cited to you. The United States, therefore, in virtue of the said article, has no right to transport cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, rope, cables, sails, sail clothes, anchors, and any parts of anchors, also ships' masts, planks, beams, and all the means, of what trees soever, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods whatever, which have not been worked into any instrument or thing, prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reputed contraband, much less such as have been already wrought and made up for any other use; all which shall be reckoned among free goods, as likewise all other merchandises, branches, and parts of branches of manufacture, and particularly all kind of drugs and spices and other such goods; so that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the subjects of both conferates, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places being only excepted, as are at that time besieged, blockaded, or invested.

The 23d article of the treaty between the United States and England states that English vessels and those of the United States shall be hospitably received in the respective ports of the two contracting nations; and article 31st of the said states: "It shall not be lawful for any foreign privates, (not being subjects or citizens of either of the said part) who have commissions from any other Prince or State in enmity with either nation, to arm their ships in the ports of either of the said parties, nor to sell what they have taken, nor in any manner to exchange the same, nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than is necessary for their ships, &c. the general part of that Prince or State from whom they obtained their commissions." And article 29th: "It shall be lawful for the ships of war and privates belonging to the said parties, respectively, to carry whithersoever they please the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any fee to the officers of the admiralty, or to any marechaux des escaisses, for the protection of the said ships, for which purpose they shall be allowed to make such provision as they shall think proper, but they shall be at liberty to hoist sail, and depart as speedily as may be, and carry their said prizes to the place mentioned in their commissions or patents, which the commanders of the said ships of war or privates shall be obliged to show. No shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as have made a prize upon the subjects or citizens of either of the said parties, but such ships shall be forced in, in particular care shall be taken to hasten their departure, and to cause them to retire as soon as possible. Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other nations. The contracting parties agree that, while they continue in amity, which is the only object of this article." But the 17th article of our treaty states that French ships of war, and those which France shall have armed for war, as also the vessels of the United States, or of their inhabitants, may conduct their prizes into the respective ports of the two nations; that neither asylum nor refuge shall be given in their ports or havens to those who shall have made prize on the respective inhabitants of the two countries, and, if they are forced to enter, by tempests or the dangers of the sea, they shall be
FRANCE.

You interpret this article to those of the treaty made with Great Britain, it will be easily seen that, during the present war, it is destroyed by the first. For, although the 25th article of the treaty with Great Britain states, "Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States," and we ought to infer therefrom that France, through imprudence, while engaged in the war and partly in consequence of which article 17th of her treaty allows her, yet it is very clear that the English will have the right of claiming the execution of the 32d and 24th articles of their treaty with the United States; that they will have, during the present war, the privilege of conducting their prizes into the ports of the United States, or of carrying them, clothed in the stigmatization of the 17th article. Moreover, this article contains this clause: "But the two parties agree that, while they continue in amity, neither of them will in future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with this or the preceding article;" which seems to prevent the establishment of a new negotiation between the United States and France, since, in a new treaty, they might grant or seek to establish the advantage over the English and the rights of the United States, that they would be refused to her in virtue of that article.

Such, sir, are the observations which I have thought it my duty to present. I shall wait for your answer, in order to transmit the treaty to the committee of public safety of the National Convention. It has never doubted that the rights of the American nation towards France, and I am convinced that the present circumstances will furnish a new proof of their good intentions.

accept, sir, the assurance, &c.

P. A. ABET.

No. 97.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Ail, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 6, 1795.

SIR: I accept, as a pledge of that harmony which you are anxious to cultivate between our two nations, your letter of the 30th ult., received on the 1st instant, at night. Let it be our unvaried practice to suffer no suspension to ripen into an unfriendly sentiment, until it shall have been imparted to each other; and let us repel with firmness the articles by which ill affected persons, under the guise of attachment to the French republic, endeavor to embitter it with unfriendly ideas.

When you expressed to me, on Monday last, some uneasiness which the report of the contents of the proposed treaty with Great Britain had excited in your breast, I more readily informed you of my intention to ask the President's permission to furnish you with a copy, as I was convinced that an entire view of it would not only enable you to correct the erroneous representations which would also be made of its nature, but to find that the highest measure of friendship and confidence would be the consequences of its execution. Having delivered to you a copy, I am now to examine the provisions which seem to you irreconcilable with our engagements to France. It has been observed by the President of the United States, and is now repeated, that those engagements shall not, with his consent, be infringed. As far, therefore, as he is concerned, you need only prove, at any time, that a given measure will infringe it, and he will not countenance that measure. The same, I am persuaded, may be affirmed of the other branches of our Government. But, after a close scrutiny of the points to which you have referred, it is not discerned that the rights of France are, in any degree, impaired.

In saying this, I must call to your recollection the manner in which the making of treaties is arranged by our constitution. The Senate advise and consent to their being made; the President ratifies them; and the courts are afterwards at liberty to construe them as particular cases arise, requiring their decision. The opinions, therefore, of the President are not obligatory on the courts. He judges for himself; they judge for themselves; and if, in the interpretation of the one or the other, the rights of the French republic are assailed, the accustomed modes of remonstrance and negotiation will still be open, and the principles upon which national redress is demanded will still have their force.

After this explanation, I proceed to state to you the result of the President's reflections on your exceptions to the proposed treaty.

These exceptions are, 1st, that the 32d and 24th articles of our commercial treaty with France are violated by the 17th and 18th of the proposed treaty; 2dly, that the 17th article of the former is destroyed by the 23d, 24th, and 25th articles of the latter; and 3dly, that the last sentence in the first paragraph of the 35th article of the proposed treaty appears inconsistent with a new negotiation between the United States and France.

First, the essence of your first objection, that the 32d article, and the reasons of your letter, is reducible to this statement: By the treaty with France, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail cloth, anchors, masts, planks, boards, and beams, of what treessoever, and all other things proper for building or repairing vessels, hemp, flax, pitch, and tar, can be exported, provided they are shipped in the freest manner by the contracting parties, even to places belonging to an enemy; such excepted only as are actually besieged, blockaded, or invested. But the proposed treaty designates as contraband, timber for ship building, tar or resin, copper in sheets, sail cloth, hemp, and cordage, and whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, (unawrought iron and fir planks only excepted,) and they are declared to be just objects of confiscation whenever they shall be attempted to be carried to an enemy. From hence you conclude that the United States may freely carry into England all things proper for the building or repairing of vessels, without fearing any obstacle to the part of France, while they can carry some only of the same kinds. France and that they have thus granted to England a right which France enjoys not, and which, in the course of the existing war, inclines the balance in favor of England.

The United States have certainly opposed the extension of contraband, whenever the British Government has sought to swell the catalogue. But it never could be denied, under the law of nations, and independently of a treaty for the building and repairing of vessels is contraband. The proposed treaty then does not grant, but recognizes only a right to Great Britain, which, even without that recognition, she would have possessed and exercised.

This recognition might have been omitted or inserted without changing the nature of the subject though it was more natural, in commercial arrangements, to particularize the articles of contraband. It was, indeed, anxiously desired to diminish the list as much as possible. But if no reciprocity could accomplish this end; if no equivalent could be offered by us to Great Britain powerful enough to induce her to renounce her rights under the law of nations, what was to be done? Many reasons will occur, sir, why it was not to be exerted by force. To become a party in the war, was neither our policy nor the wish of your republic. To become a party in the war for a cause which the armed neutrality itself never would have asserted, would have been supported by no civilized nation.

The United States have, therefore, wilfully surrendered no right relative to contraband.

Nor is the treaty with France contravened by this acknowledgment of contraband. It stipulates that, if France be at war, and the vessels of the United States carry naval stores to her enemy, French cruisers shall not capture them. The property of a neutral to seize such vessels is undefined. The inference is, that France has relaxed her strict rights, in consideration that the United States have relaxed their rights, but that Great Britain will not relax hers. The treaty with France, therefore, remains unimpaired by the proposed compact with Great Britain.

The true light in which the subject is to be viewed, is that which you have caught, when you allude to the effect which the right of Great Britain to seize naval stores going from the United States to France may have upon her interest, while she continues bound not to seize such stores going from the United States to England.

Our treaty with France was entered into with a perfect knowledge, on both sides, that they were striking out on the surface of the principles of the law of nations, which the law of nations denominated such. They were both apprized that, if the United States should be at war with Great Britain, the shipping of France, carrying naval stores to Great Britain, could not be seized by American cruisers; while the same shipping bringing naval stores to the United States might be seized by British cruisers. They saw, therefore, the reciprocity of the prohibition. Why then was not the same principle applied to the happens to a British frigate, a British merchant vessel, or a British fishing vessel? Perhaps from a belief that it was not so important. Perhaps, on the part of the United States, from a confidence that their internal supplies would be ample; and on that of France, that their home resources, their own ships and convoys, would accommodate them with those stores. Or, more probably, neither of the contracting Powers would have, when it became manifest that they could obtain other more advantageous terms, thought the treaty was so important. On any event, it may be, the proposed treaty does not vary the situation of France, nor better the rights of Great Britain, in one lot of contraband.

There has been a time, indeed, when France felt herself absolved from the stipulation that free ships make free goods, because Great Britain, by capturing hostile property in American bottoms, rendered disadvantageous to France to spare British property in those bottoms. But the law of the 13th Nivose, in the 3d year, to which you refer, has banished that mode of reasoning, and has created a precedent for our mode.

Hitherto, however, I have spoken upon principles of right. Upon any other principles, and more especially upon those of hardship and injury to a friend, it shall be a topic of the negotiation now opening between us. With the temper which will pervade the whole of it, I cannot doubt that some modification may be devised; and it may be separated from the general treaty, so as not to be delayed.

Second: In my judgment you misconceive the proposed treaty when you imagine that the English will have a right to claim the execution of the 33d and 24th articles of it, in derogation of the 17th article of our treaty with France; that is to say, that, in the course of the present war, they may conduct their prizes, made from the French, into the ports of the United States. They will not possess such a privilege during the present, or any other war with France. For "nothing in the proposed treaty contained shall be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States." The British plenipotentiary was here admonished of our prior engagements, and of our determination to postpone to them any new contract with Great Britain. Our treaties have always been saved by the general description, which was the most eligible form of expression, because it was shorter, and equally well adapted to comprehend all our treaties. It is the same form of expression with that which was adopted in the year 1786, in the treaty between France and Great Britain.

The 40th article of the last mentioned treaty, and the 23d of the proposed treaty, are, in substance, alike; and yet it was clearly and properly understood, when the French and English treaty was made, that our commercial treaty with France was not in this respect shaken. We have, at least, never complained of any infraction of ours from this cause, and, therefore, are sincere in believing that France can be as little affected by our treaty with Great Britain, as we are by the treaty we have with Great Britain.

In your quotation of the 33d article of the treaty with Great Britain, you observe, that the vessels of the English are to be received with hospitality in the ports of the United States. They are the "ships of war," the public navy, not the privateers, which are to be so received. Now the British ships of war are not prohibited by our treaty with France, and are not in the least under any exceptional circumstances. From these there are not released by the proposed treaty, because our treaty with France, which is a supreme law of the land, is decisively contrary.

The 24th article of the proposed treaty is, with a very small and unessential difference, the same with the 16th article of the French treaty with Great Britain; that the proposed treaty should be signed by their existing right of France arising from our treaty of commerce; but the treaty between France and Great Britain does not, by any general or particular expression, save the rights of the United States, which might stand in opposition to that sixteenth article. We have never renemonstrated, because we always thought ourselves secure under the faith of France and all our other treaties.

Third. Upon the third and last head of objection, which you urge against the proposed treaty, little notice is to be taken. You shall continue to enjoy your rights under the seventeenth article of our treaty with France. We will not ask you to renounce the advantages which that article assures you. To the objection, on which you lay so much stress, it is evident that a treaty between France and Great Britain would entirely supplant the old one, would be prevented by the twenty-fifth article, the consequence may be easily avoided, by declaring that so much of the old one as is connected with any particular, for which it may be desirable to retain a priority, shall remain in force. This is a remedy so obvious that I flatter myself it will remove any difficulty in the way of a new negotiation.

Should an embarrassment still hang upon these points, I must entreat you to afford me an opportunity of meeting them before your communications are dispatched to the committee of public safety.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 98.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. James Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary at Paris.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 12, 1795.

SIR: The office of Secretary of State being at present vacant by the resignation of Mr. Randolph, I have it in command from the President to ask your attention to the following articles, dated November 7th, 1794, January 13, February 12, 18, March 6, 7, 12, 13, May 7, 17, June 14 and 26, and to communicate such information as the present state of things appears to require.

These articles have already been furnished with a copy of the treaty lately negotiated between the United States and Great Britain; but, lest that should have miscarried, you will find another enclosed. This treaty has, after the most mature deliberation, been ratified by the President, on the condition proposed by the Senate, and has been transmitted to London. On the presumption that it will receive an equivalent ratification on the part of Great Britain, you will receive a copy of the two treaties, which contain the expressions of the opinions of the Government, especially as it appears probable, from your letters, and from the movements of disaffected persons here, that unfavorable impressions upon the Government and people of France may be apprehended. As we have ever been most sincerely desirous of cultivating friendship with that nation, the most prompt and candid measures were taken in every stage of the negotiation to produce tranquility and satisfaction, which the rules prescribed by custom in such cases would justify or permit. The result, now made public, will evince that the rights of France, whether founded on the laws of nations, or their treaties with us, remain unviolated and unimpaired.

This is what you tell me that the present instruction of the Secretary of State, are enclosed, by which you will perceive the nature of the objections which were urged, and that such explanations were immediately given, and such constructions adopted, as must have been satisfactory. We infer this from less the explanations themselves than from the subsequent silence of the minister.

The late conduct of Great Britain incurred a great many vessels of the United States laden with provisions, and bound to France is, however, calculated to create inquietudes; it is therefore proper to explain the 18th article more jects, to this they are invited no less by their pacific policy, which inclines to cultivate and extend neutral rights, than by the operation of the law of nations upon several valuable articles of export. The commercial war, however, may be suspended, if this country is associated with its immediate interests; accordingly, the most zealous exertions have been uniformly made by the United States to establish principles favorable to free commerce. A time of war was, however, most unfavorable for this purpose, especially when the object, as in the present case, was to induce a powerful maritime nation to make concessions to an inferior and neutral asylum.

The result of the negotiation with Great Britain has therefore shown that she will not relax, in our favor, from the strict maxims of the law of nations defining contraband, the principles of which are adopted in the treaty. Thus, though the subjects of several kinds of merchandizes, which the British have, in some instances, been permitted to introduce, and may in future be introduced, with the consent of the British, the United States have, as far as possible, obtained that the merchandise of the one nation shall be treated in the same manner as that of the other. The character of contraband, admitted to be articles of free commerce, yet it is believed that not a single one is included as contraband which has not been ranked as such by approved writers on the law of nations. It is not, therefore, correctly said that we have relinquished any neutral rights, the exercise of which would have been beneficial to France; for the case of France has been considered to be as free from a right to contraband as the case of the United States. The treaty has barely recited in the list of contraband what was before so, under a law which we could not mitigate; and, though we were desirous of relaxing the rigor of this law, yet a recital of it, in the present treaty, was the best which could be done, and was necessary, in order to adorn our maritime and commercial citizens of this peaceable nation.

The second clause of the 18th article clearly refers to the doctrine asserted by Great Britain, that provisions may become contraband when destined to places not invested or blockaded. To this pretension, which is contrary to our interests, and, as we are inclined to believe, unwarried by the law of nations, especially in the acceptation by Great Britain, we could not accede. The opinions of our Government, on this subject, formerly expressed, are well known to you, being amply detailed in the correspondence of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Pinckney, in the year 1793. Though we have not been able to induce Great Britain to relinquish her construction, we have been able, however, to show that, whatever the interpretations, and whether absolutely contraband, shall become such, and, for that reason, be seized, they shall not be confiscated, but paid for, with a reasonable mercantile profit, including freight and the expenses incident to the detention.

It is obvious that, if the British construction of the law of nations were admitted to be just, the stipulation in the present treaty, as our sentiments at present do not, however, concur with that construction; the contrary appears from the treaty. We have only 'geared, by such means as were in our power, against the full effects of a doctrine which has been, and which will be, strenuously opposed by all reasonable means which may offer.

This was of such a nature that it was unavoidable by force, is a question which it pertains to the proper authorities of the United States to decide. They are the exclusive judges and competent guardians of whatever concerns our interests, policy, and honor; and, on these subjects, they will never ask the advice, nor be governed by the counsels of any foreign nation whatever. We acknowledge ourselves bound to stipulate nothing which may derogate from our prior engagements. This we have not done by the present treaty, and this we will never do. Even in cases where we are not bound by treaty, we will not stipulate to surrender our rights, as a neutral nation, to the injury of our friends; but we must be left to determine in what manner we can most beneficially obey an evil, and when it is proper for us to repel an injury. The legislation of the British Government has, it is true, added the calamities of war to the misfortunes of peace, and our happy Government, and having nothing left to hope or desire beyond our present internal enjoyment, our solicitudes are principally attracted to the vexations and deprivations committed upon our commerce. These are, indeed, the principal evils of which we complain by all the parties to the war, notwithstanding which our commerce has continued to be lucrative and extensive, though, unfortunately for us, as we have no means of protecting it against injustice, it is vulnerable in the same proportion that it is extensive.

The degree of security which we enjoy is well known to depend more upon the common wants of nations at war, than upon any evasions which an immediate make of an offensive nature. Indeed nothing of this kind could be attempted by us without a total sacrifice of our commerce. How preposterous is that policy which requires us to abandon and destroy the very object, for the preservation of which we are invited to commence hostilities.

It may not be amiss to dilate on the consequences of our engaging in the war with Great Britain.

First. Seeing she has the command of the sea, (and appearances strongly indicate that she will maintain that command) our commerce might, in one year, be annihilated, and thousands of our seamen be shut up, or dying in gals and Hospitals with wounds of war. The seamen in commerce would then be our standard of price; and against the object so alluring and so assailable as the American commerce should present. If we look back to the two last years of our Revolution war, a judgment may be formed on this point. A striking defect in her naval arrangements, in preceding years, left our ports open for the entry of commerce; for the equipping of privateers; and the protection of small privateers. But from this period it has been, that the apprehensions of the British have been so strong that small privateers were hauled up, as no longer able to cope even with their armed merchantmen, and the larger privateers were taken. Our merchantable shipping fell, at the same time, a sacrifice to the vigilant operations of the British. Hence it is that every moment her naval power is extended beyond all former examples, while that of her enemies is, at least, not increased.

Second. Our landed, as well as commercial interests would suffer beyond all calculation. Agriculture, above the supply of our own wants, would be suspended, or its produce perish on our hands. The value of our lands and every species of agricultural property would sink.

Third. The sources of revenue failing, public credit would be destroyed, and multitudes of our citizens, now depending on its preservation, be involved in ruin. The people at large, from the summit of prosperity, would be precipitated into a state of misery, and too severely patient to be borne. To increase their calamities, or make them feel more sensibly, direct taxes would be imposed, for the expense of war, and we should be happy for us if we could contemplate only a foreign war, in which all hearts and hands might be united.

Fourth. Under the circumstances mentioned, a war with Great Britain would be essentially injurious to France. We are morally tied to her by a strong line of (not merely a friendly) engagements. We should, as an end to our intercourse with France: and it is by our commerce only that we can give her any valuable aid. Men she wants not and if she did want, we could not transport them. But while we continue our neutrality, the benefits we may render to France, and her colonies, are immense. And although the renewal of the order for cap- tures, and the new, vexatious, and expensive course of prisons, may vex the United States, yet the tenor of the 18th article of our late treaty with Great Britain, though with some a subject of clamor, will remedy, in a degree, the mischievous tendency of that order; for the article, far from giving a right to Great Britain to capture contraband in her ports, gives her a right to seize at her ports, by legitimate means, any British vessel.
States to obtain from her some stipulation, which, without admitting her claim, would not leave our commerce to future stipulations without any definite means of liquidation or redress.

Some men, forgetting their own preferred principles, when they advert only to our relation to Great Britain, forgetting that they are the citizens of an independent State, have said that, while France, with whom we have a treaty of amity and commerce, was at war, they sought not to enjoy a similar treaty, by which our situation would be changed. But where is the principle, to support this rule? and where will it find any limits? We have treaties with many other Powers, one or the other of whom may be always at war: are we never then to make another treaty?

Others have said, France will be displeased. This we should regret; for two reasons: one, because we really wish to please our old and friendly allies; the other, because we desire to see, and doubt not we shall see, her deportment towards us correspond with her own fundamental principle, that every independent nation has an exclusive right to manage its own affairs. All our external duties centre here—that in our new engagements we violate no principle of negotiation.

That France should manifest a watchful jealousy of any connexions we might form with her ancient and inveterate enemy, is perfectly natural. It is the same spirit which prompted her to afford us that efficient aid, which was so important to the achieving of our independence. The breaking off so large a portion of the British empire, the powers of a formidable rival was essentially diminished. No wonder she should now be alive to the remotest prospect of re-union—not of government, but of interests and good will. But, to the following positions you may give all the solemnity of truth.

That the late negotiation has not proceeded from any predilection in our Government towards Great Britain. We abide by our original declaration respecting the British: “we hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.”

Second. That from the remembrance of a long, bloody, and distressing war, from which we were just beginning to recover, and to taste the blessings of peace, whatever even seemed to tend to a renewal of it, was seriously deprecated.

Third. That there were many causes of difference between us and Great Britain, the adjustment of which admitted of no longer delay. One was the detention of the western posts, under a real or affected belief that the United States were the first to infringe the peace of 1783. From this detention resulted a bloody and expensive Indian war, a loss of revenue by a suspension of the sale of lands; and a deprivation of the far trade. To these were added fresh excitments to a more extended source of revenue, and that revenue itself. Our diffusion had risen to a height that required an immediate remedy. War or negotiation were the alternatives. We chose the latter. Had this failed, war seemed scarcely avoidable. But in that case, these good effects were counted upon. The consciousness of using the proper means of averting so great a calamity; union among ourselves, when war should have been avoided, and division among those who should have refused an amicable settlement of our just demands; besides which we gained time for preparation.

Fourth. That the commercial part of the treaty, though not unimportant, was but a subordinate object, and at the same time not a new measure. This is well known to every well informed citizen of the United States. It is a fact that a commercial treaty has been sought after ever since the peace: under the old Government, and since the establishment of the new one. It is a fact that, upon the arrival of Mr. Hammond, the British minister, and an intimation that he was empowered to enter into commercial arrangements, he was met with aversity by Mr. Jefferson, the Secretary of State and when it was discovered that his powers extended only to an inconclusive discussion of this subject, disappointment and chagrin were the result. It may be added that measures have been proposed and supported in the Legislature, the sole object of which was, to force Great Britain into a commercial treaty. Fifth. That the Government of the United States is sincerely friendly to the French nation. The latter doubtless believe that the body of American citizens are well affected towards them. The belief is well founded. But it is equally applicable to those in the administration of the government. If any thing could weaken this general attachment, it would be a recurrence to such disorganizing projects and outrages on the sovereignty and dignity of the United States as marked and disgraced the ministry of Genet. The precipitate, and, in the main, ill-founded resolutions of a few small popular meetings, are not to be taken as true indications of the American sentiment: very different is the opinion of the great body of the people. These are beyond example prosperous, contented, and happy. Where any symptoms of another nature have appeared, they are to be traced to ignorant or perverse misrepresentations of the treaty. This, as it becomes better understood, is more and more approved.

That the treaty would settle every point in dispute entirely to our satisfaction, and secure to us all the commercial advantages we could wish for, no reasonable man could expect. Our antagonists, too, had claims, opinions, and wishes. And where there are opposing interests, nations, as well as individuals, are likely to make erroneous estimates of their real importance. When, then, it is to be supposed that every agent could see all the points more to our advantage, the terms as we see them were adopted. The Senate, after a very deliberate discussion and consideration of the treaty, in all its relations, advised its ratification, on the condition stated in their resolution; and this was the form that the President had determined to take to give his assent to his assent. We are disposed to think that his assent will be given: for it is the interest of Great Britain not to increase the number of her enemies, or to deprive herself of the benefits of a commercial intercourse with the United States. It is not less our interest to remain at peace. And the President, as the first minister of the republic, unless he should have been袒护, was wrong this the fact, they ought to have applied to me made to prosecute those who should violate the neutrality of the United States, the punctuality with which these promises have been fulfilled, should have induced those officers to inform the functionaries of the French republic, even if it had not been their duty to so do.
Nothing can justify this outrage. If an unfaithful or weak keeper had committed a fault, it were sufficient to inform me of it; I should have delivered him to his proper judges, and the Americans would not have overstepped their rights, and offended an ally attached to them by so many ties.

Accept my esteem,

JH. FAUCHET.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, September 25, 1794.

SIR: I regret extremely that any citizen of the United States, and, more especially, if he be in authority, should offer either outrage or insult to a vessel of the French republic. I have accordingly written to the attorney of the district of New York, to inquire into and report the facts, as you will perceive from the enclosed copy. The course might have been shortened by directing him to proceed in the case as the law directs. But this has not been adopted, because we wish to reserve to ourselves the decision in this particular, as it is suggested that a public officer is concerned, and we take an interest in causing Justice to be done to the French republic, as far as possible, under our own eye.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, September 25, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor of enclosing to you the translation of a letter from the minister of the French republic, complaining of an outrage on a French vessel of war. Resolved, as we are, to act with good faith and friendship towards our ally, I must request you to inquire into the facts, and transmit what shall be found to be an accurate state of them, in order that Government may proceed to do what is proper and honorable on the occasion.

I am, &c.

No. 32.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, November 17, 1794.

SIR: The Executive of the United States being obliged to collect information of facts at a distance through the public officers, and having a confidence in them, it was conceived sufficient, in the first instance, merely to transmit to you the evidence which had been obtained respecting the Favorite. Hence, in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you on the 23d ultimo, I did no more than note the enclosures, reserving any reflections until I should be ascertained on your part, whether the allegations were true.

The opinion which the President has formed relates both you and myself of no small difficulty in comparing and weighing the testimony.

He has thought proper to instruct me to inform you that, on the fault which he always reposes in your assertions, he takes these points for granted: that the Favorite is a public vessel of war, bearing the commission of the French republic; and that no contravention of the act prohibiting the exportation of military stores was meditated in the application of those which were found on board.

The President highly approves that a public vessel of war, belonging to a foreign nation, should be searched by officers of the customs, upon a suspicion of illicit commerce. The propriety of representing such a suspicion to the consul of that nation, or the commander of the vessel, will not be controverted, this being a course respectful and customary. A general instruction will, therefore, be given to pursue this course, with the view, that, if it should be ineffectual, the Government of the United States may adopt those measures which the necessity of the case and their rights may require.

A particular instruction, founded on the same principles, will be also forwarded to the collector of New York; with this addition, to discontinue the prosecution against the property, and restore what may be within his power or command. At the same time I must repeat the assurance which we entertain, that you will prevent the stores from being used in any manner contrary to the act before referred to.

I flatter myself, sir, that this republication of what is past, and the precaution against the future, will manifest such a disposition in our Government as will induce you to approve the decision which a sense of justice imposes upon the President to waive any further measures: for the appearances and circumstances of the Favorite might have misled the best intended man into a misapprehension of her real character. And, in truth, something is due to the consideration that, in our new situation, it cannot be expected that all our officers should meet every occurrence with a correct knowledge of the usages of nations.

An insult to the French flag will not be tolerated by the President, whenever he can prevent or punish it. But the depositions do not place this subject in so clear a light as to prove its existence, or to designate the culpable person. It is the President's purpose, therefore, to cause the officers of the customs to be admonished to respect your flag; and if this be not satisfactory, and you are still persuaded that an insult has been committed, I shall be ready to concur in any arrangement which may be convenient, for the full examination of such other witnesses as may be produced.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 34.

Mr. Lamb, Collector of New York, to the Secretary of the Treasury.

NEW YORK, November 29, 1794.

Sir:—I acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 22d instant, respecting the articles seized on board the French ship the Favorite, and agreeably to your directions have ordered them to be restored.

At the time the seizure was made, the Favorite having been totally dismantled, her crew sent on board other ships of war, and her sails, rigging, and other materials, having been sold at public auction, she was considered as a hulk; otherwise, the event would not have taken place.

With respect to the charge, that the officers of the customs had pulled down the national flag on board of the above mentioned vessel, and hoisted another in its place, it is groundless, as will appear by the papers transmitted to the Secretary of State, by Mr. Harrison, the district attorney.

I am, with great respect, sir, &c.

JOHN LAMB.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 14, 1794.

Sir:—Information has been given to the President of the United States that the privateer, called la Carmagnole, which has always been considered as one of those fitted out in opposition to the sense of our Government, is now in the river Delaware. This vessel is represented to retain still her warlike apparatus. It is probable that you have not been informed that she was ordered to quit our ports, or to be dismantled. But, notwithstanding this injunction, her military qualities are not yet lay aside, and she continues to go out and come into our ports. I am confident, sir, that you will disapprove of this proceeding, and that you will render it unnecessary for the President to execute the determination which he finds himself compelled to make, under the circumstances of the case, that la Carmagnole be dismantled. The readiness with which you complied with the wish of the Government on a similar occasion induces me to hope that you will issue orders for dismantling her; and prevent the President from taking on this subject, those measures which he wishes to avoid.

The expedition with which this privateer moves will naturally suggest to you the propriety of my requesting that your interference should be as prompt as possible.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, 20th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, (16th August, 1794, O. S.)

Sir:—I inform you that the uneasiness testified by the Government of the United States, relative to the Columbia, which was supposed to be in the Delaware, is groundless. This vessel received an order from me on the 4th instant to put to sea immediately. If she has not executed it, she must have been prevented by the English forces or by the necessity of making some indispensable repairs, before the voyage she is about to undertake.

Accept my respect.

PHILADELPHIA, August 20, 1794.

Sir:—I should have done myself the honor before this day of transmitting to you a copy of certain rules, instituted by the President of the United States in relation to the belligerent Powers, if I had not taken it for granted that your intercourse with your predecessor had rendered it unnecessary. But I take the liberty of now enclosing them, as having a direct connexion with my letter to you of the 14th instant, and with your reply on the 16th.

The correspondence from the Department of State with Mr. Genet will inform you of the motives upon which these rules are founded. They have created a system of obligation on our part towards those Powers, and therefore require our attention.

But the Carmagnole (or Columbia) has been the subject of particular letters from Governor Clinton to Mr. Genet, and the French consul at New York; and the result has been an assurance that she should no longer offend those rules. This assurance has produced a great degree of anxiety that she should not now enter our ports, under the circumstances which were first offensive to the Government, and contrary to its sense, as has been often expressed concerning her. It is very far from the wish of the President that your despatches should be at any time interrupted. The step of dismantling which is desired is merely to fail an engagement which has been frequently made. Whether the Carmagnole be at present in the Delaware, we cannot at this place ascertain. If she has sailed, I have only to communicate to you the hope and expectation of the President that you will, by your orders, prevent her from returning to our ports in her military equipment. If she has not sailed, we must repeat our confidence that you will cause her to be dismantled. The rules above referred to will not permit an illicit privateer, as she has been deemed to be, to make any reparations within the United States.

Permit me to request an early answer to this letter, and to learn that you will direct the necessary measures to be immediately adopted, and cut off the painful necessity of measures, adequate to the end being pursued by the Government.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, 4th Fructidor, (21st August, 1794, O. S.) 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:—I told you verbally, and repeat it in writing, that the Cornelia and the Columbia had sailed for France. Then my intention was, that they should not return armed into the ports of the United States. But they were compelled to take shelter by the pursuit of the English vessels of war, which at this time block up all your ports. It would be as unjust as unreasonable to impede to them as a crime this return, which was rendered necessary by so unhappy a circumstance; unless it was wished that these two vessels should become the prey of the English; and I avow it with profound sorrow, that I have been tempted to entertain this opinion, when I learnt that, at New York, orders had been given to the Cornelius immediately to quit that port, although it was known that two English frigates were to have seized her on her departure. But it is unfortunate for me to have to deplore a double injury to the public officers of a free nation, to give myself up to this impression; and, at the same time, it is too grateful to me to prove with what strictness we fulfill our treaties and our engagements, to omit giving you the following details.

The first of these two vessels is the Columbia, which is at New York, destined, to be there completely dismantled. The second, the Columbus, which was in the Delaware, departed thence on the 17th of this month. I am surprised, sir, that you were not informed of her departure, with as much care as you were of her arrival. Perhaps it was not the duty of the same person to give the two advices, which might have prevented your sending to the federal Government such with so much exactness the new obligations which it has imposed upon itself, in relation to England, is it not just to require from it the same scrupulous observance of sacred treaties, which it has long since contracted with France? Why, then, is an asylum refused to an unfortunate barque, which in its flight had thrown into the sea some of her cannon and of her water, when it is given, though against the tenor of these very treaties, to the vessels of war which have taken prizes from the citizens of the republic? Without doubt, sir, this violation, which is so fatal to us, takes place through forgetfulness only. It would be horrible to me to attribute it to any other motive; therefore, I content myself with subjoining here to an extract of the 17th article, in order to recall it to your remembrance.

"Art. 17th. And on the contrary, no asylum or retreat shall be given in their ports or harbors to those who shall have taken prizes from the subjects of His Majesty or the said States; and if they are compelled to enter them by tempest or the danger of the seas, they shall be obliged to depart as soon as possible.

Neither terror nor the danger of the seas have compelled the English vessels of war to enter your ports; notwithstanding, they have been there supplied; notwithstanding, they remain there to interrupt your commerce and your supplies; and notwithstanding, we are your nearest allies.

Accept, sir, &c.

No. 39.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, September 7, 1794.

SIR:—Feeling, at all times acknowledging, as the President of the United States does, the obligations of our treaty, and restoring, by every consideration, which comes into competition with them, he read, not without regret, the following passage in your letter of the 21st ultimo:

"'Why, then, was an asylum refused to an unhappy barque, which in its flight had thrown into the sea a part of its cannon and of its water, while it was granted, contrary to the tenor of these very treaties, to vessels of war, which had taken prizes from the citizens of this republic? Without doubt, sir, this equal violation, which is so fatal to us, arises from forgetfulness only. It would be horrible to me to attribute it to any other motive. I therefore content myself with subjoining hereon an extract from the 17th article, to recall it to your remembrance;'

There was, sir, during the existence of your predecessor's functions, a period at which we were obliged to summon all the strength and force of our friendship for the French republic, to combat the varous forms of aggression which he offered to our Government. But let these be now buried in eternal oblivion, scaled, as it has been, by the justice rendered to our wishes, in the removal of him, and in the departure of his successor. This period is therefore revived for a moment, merely for the purpose of referring you to that of our remonstrances which are to be found among your papers of office, and which speak the sensibility of the United States at the equipment of privaters within their limits. And it is recollected, even now, not from the most distant apprehension that the measure will be repeated under your countenance, but to point to the reasons which produced our solicitude on the occasion.

Except vessels of this description, all belonging to the French republic or French citizens, have been admitted into our ports with cordiality. Where an asylum in general has been refused to any, it was a consequence of an infraction of our sovereignty. If, in the particular instance to which you allude, the denial of asylum has been aggravated by circumstances of improper severity, it is more than we knew, until your communication: it is what the President would absolutely disapprove. If your interpretation of the treaty of commerce be accurate, that is, if no ship of war, which had made prize of French vessels, could be received into our ports, still no complaint of this kind has yet reached the Executive of the United States from any functionary of France, or any other authority.

But it would be uncandid to conceal from you the construction which we have hitherto deemed the true one. The first part of the 21st article refers to French ships of war and privaters, entering our ports with their prizes: the second contrasts the situation of the enemies of France by forbidding such as shall have made prize of the French; intimating from this connexion of the two that there would be no possibility of bringing their prizes into our ports. It has been a discussion, that this sector of the treaty was principally destined to the withholding of protection or succor to the prizes themselves. Had it been otherwise, it would have been superfluous to have prohibited in the 22d article foreign privaters from sailing to the harbors of the United States.

Be assured, sir, of this truth: that it would be a reflection to the President of the United States if our treaties with the French nation had ever been infringed with his assents; and further, that, if they ever shall be, he will be ready, as he always has been, to bear and inquire, and to cause offenses against them to be punished, errors to be rectified, and injuries to be duly compensated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9d of the Sans Culottes, (18th September, 1794, O. S.), 9th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:—In assuring me of the true sentiments of the President you do no more than confirm the opinion I have entertained of his virtues, and especially of his sincerity and attachment to the sublime cause of liberty, for which he has fought, as the French republicans are now fighting. It is very agreeable to me to partake of this opinion with all his friends. I have excited for him the admiration of all my countrymen by laying down some which I have to believe have been made upon treaties which unite our two nations? He has not done the injury, and been to apply the remedy. It was not then reproaches I made to him, but an opportunity I afforded him of exercising his natural inclination to do what is just and becoming the nation he represents, and by whom he is justly venerated.

In speaking of the duties imposed by the treaty, it requires me to state what is necessary to be done by your Highness, and the reflections it contains; rendered necessary still more by the recent persecutions which the French are made to suffer by the servile submission of the subaltern agents of the Executive of the United States, which requires me to recall to your attention the lessons which your Highness has given me, and the plant which you have generously made to me.

I am, sir, your obedient servant.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
which has slipped into your despatch. You tell me, “if your construction of the treaty of commerce is correct.” &c. This involves two facts, which I equally oppose. The first is, that the article which I have quoted may be susceptible of several constructions; the second is, that I have given an arbitrary meaning to this article. You forsake these two suppositions to construe, in a manner favorable to our enemies, a part of the treaty which it is necessary totally to retrace, if your interpretation is adopted. Should you have permitted me to avail myself of the remarks you have made to demonstrate to me that the import literally expressed is not the true import, and to substitute an ambiguity for a very clear and positive stipulation.

I reply to you—

The first part of the 17th article relates to French ships of war and privateers, entering our ports with their prizes; the prize now presents a precise contrast. The connexion of the contrast which exists between these two clauses, therefore, intimates that the vessels forbidden are those which bring their prizes with them.”

I am of opinion that our Government is to retrace this article. You will thereby see at once, that the said vessels (capturing) or their prizes, (which proves that both have an equal right to this privilege) cannot be arrested or seized, whether, &c. and, in the second part of the article you will find, “That in the contrary, no vessel, &c. shall be liable to such punishment (as to such action, and in such manner as to think, but to such as capture, it) may be well to observe to you, sir, that, by capturing, vessels, is always understood the whole fleet, and not the particular vessels of that fleet which may have managed the prizes. The matter then is not alone, as you seem desirous of understanding it, to refuse all succor to prizes, but also to show that there is a whole set of provisions, in which two points have come in, being forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, all proper means shall be used that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible.” Hence the want of repairs after a battle, of which a prize might be supposed to be the consequence, a desire to take to provisions, in order to prolong a cruise without returning to the ports of their own nation, are not, as you esteem them, sufficient titles for our enemies to obtain an entry into your ports. Hence, the principal advantage which the allied nations wished mutually to assure to each other by this article, was not so much to make the difficulty of disencumbering themselves of, or selling their prizes, felt by their enemies, as to give them from them the idea of putting the prisoners of war, or returns to their own country to victual and supply themselves with provisions and water. This consequence naturally follows from the foregoing provisions, which would otherwise be without meaning and, therefore, would discover nothing but folly in the framers of the treaty, which is not susceptible. If their object was only to prohibit vessels from taking to their enemies, or giving to their privateers prizes, they would have been what you suppose, they would have formally expressed it; they would not have said, “Such as shall have made prize,” but the vessels with their prizes. For my part, I cannot see in a treaty what it does not contain, and I cannot help seeing in it what it clearly expresses, I closely adhere to the letter, and when my opponent does not understand that the captors of French property should be driven from your ports. Now English ships have made prizes; I thence conclude, that English ships should not find shelter in your ports: I thence conclude, that the asylum granted to them is a violation of our treaties. If it be true, as you wrote me, that the French privateers have paid an indemnity, and my predecessors never complained of this violation, it was because, far from being just, for causes of complaint, when we had reason, we have always respected the situation of the American Government, it was because the audacity and vexations, practised by the English against your commerce and the law of nations, increase in proportion as you guarantee your vessels. It is far from being the case to long patience with which your Government, sanctified by the habits of its nation, and by the laws of its peace, has always been determined to observe all its means, in fine, which its prudence suggests to obtain justice; but I am grieved to see the commercial connexions of the French republic and the United States entirely dissolved by so many harassments. I am grieved to see the seizures which the French ships of war, and my predecessor, made of American vessels, for violation of our treaties, and which are supposed to be bound for a French port. I am grieved to see the United States suffer in the silence of English proclamations, which are executed even upon their coasts. I am grieved that, at this moment, an alliance between a free people and a Machiavelian Government is talked of. In supposing this rumor to be true, however monstrous such an alliance would subsist, I see much on the sincerity with which the Executive of the United States keeps its engagements, as still to demand, with confidence, their execution.

An occasion now presents itself. Even adopting your construction of the treaty, it has just been violated at Norfolk. The English frigate Terpsichore anchored there with a French privateer, called La Montague, which she had in the possession of the republic, complained, in writing to the Governor of Virginia, against this infraction, and a length of time elapsed without the Governor’s deigning to give him an answer. I expect one from you, whose principles I know, more expressly, no doubt, and conformable with justice. This delay gives rise to a very painful idea, that there is no real effort to save the capture, or to prevent the establishment of the coldest of satisfaction to our lawful demands. Norfolk will furnish the two proofs of what I advance; the execution of our treaties was claimed; but no answer was given. A vessel whose mast was broken in her passage to Guadalupe, where she was carrying provisions, was obliged to return to Norfolk. It was immediately wished to arrest her. Norfolk was one of those American ships, which, without exceeding the law of nations, and without insulting to the public officers of the republic, that I am obliged to enter into some details relative to this affair. A Frenchman learned at Charleston the recapture of Guadalupe; his first feelings excited him to go to the assistance of his newly arrived brother; he purchased a schooner, which he loaded with supplies, as if it was designed to make a constable, without giving the ground of the suit instituted against him, as if it was desired to make the consular act a part of a constable. I send you the documents which establish this fact. I know, sir, that you will answer me, that a superior court will determine upon the legality of these persecutions, and that justice has the power to decide them. But, in an unjust prosecution, which they may have intrusted me, it is of little consequence to the English agents how the suit shall be determined; if they have contravened an operation which was to save a French colony, they have attained the object they proposed; and if, in the present case, for example, they should be obliged to pay large damages, it is very likely that the funds still remaining after the sacrifices of one of our colonies, it must be to them as grateful, as it is grievous to us, to render those the instruments of the ruin of one of our possessions in the islands, who have guaranteed their safe possession by their treaties with us.

With all this I must urge against the Federal Government, with my complaints, I must again recur to the capture of the English briganite Perseverence. I shall content myself with submitting the facts, and shall leave you to the reflections to which they may give rise.

The American Perseverance was captured by the privateer le Sans Pareil, commissioned at Cape Francois, in the Island of St. Domingo, arrived in New York* the 13th of last August. The English vice consul immediately suggested that the Sans Pareil had been commissioned at Charleston. The collector of the customs at once caused the prize to be seized, the captors to be expelled, possession to be taken, and all her papers to be carried away.

*Newport.
The French prize master wished to object to two English sailors, who, being improperly influenced, declared, under oath, that he had killed a man at Charleston, and he was finally imprisoned.

Happily, the consul of the republic at Boston being informed of this strange persecution, sent his chancellor to Newport.

The chancellor found that, from just suspicions conceived against the two English sailors, and the impossibility of their giving security to appear at the criminal suit commenced against the prize master, they had been themselves committed to prison; that seeing themselves abandoned, uneasy about the consequences, perhaps repentant, they had confessed that their deposition was false; that, finally, they had retracted judicially, by confessing that they had been confused; and that, in the mean time, nobody was prosecuted but the two perjurers; and that the final enlargement of the prize master was delayed.

The chancellor, on his arrival, requested from the collector a communication of the papers of the prize; he requested him to send her to Providence, for the sake of greater security, because an attempt had been made the night before, by the owner and the English sailors, to carry her off. He obtained neither, was obliged to protest, and went to Newport to claim justice from the Governor.

The Governor heard the case on the 20th of August. The English vice consul obtained its adjournment to a distant day, and appeared desirous of gaining time. Finally, the prize was released to the captain; but, in the interval, she became injured, the costs of suit consumed a part of her value, and the privaters became discouraged.

I spare you, sir, an infinity of daily complaints, all of which equally disclose an extreme facility in a great number of the civil officers of the United States, of condescension to the first requisitions of the English agents, and who thereby second, no doubt involuntarily, the intrigues of our pernicious enemies. It would be very pleasing to me no more to be obliged to trouble you with the recital of the injustice and malevolence of which those men are the victims; who, after having brought death, are compelled to submit to all the disgusts of the most emerging chicanery, before they can enjoy the price of their blood; those men, finally, who are afraid of losing, in fulfilling the office of the lawyer, about which they know but little, that time which they might have better employed in purging your coasts of the pirates who devour your commerce.

Pardon, sir, the length of this despatch; the importance of the matter which I have treated would not admit of more severity only by malice, and had been set at liberty; I will be entirely against the wish of my heart; and I must pray you not to attribute them to any design of offending it, but to a sentiment of grief which I feel in writing it. You have been long persuaded of the profound esteem I profess for him who is your head, and whom I every day learn more to venerate.

SIR: I send you the answer given by Mr. Lee, Governor of Virginia, to the vice consul of Norfolk, who claimed the execution of the seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States. I shall be obliged by your informing me what the instructions are, which this Governor could have received from the President, or, at least, what is the issue of my complaints against the manifest violation of the article I have just cited.

I beg leave to observe to you that the brevity of the letter of Mr. Lee affords no satisfaction, and that, if he delay any length of time in obtaining information, the justice I demand will be too tardy, and will afford the English frigates time to be supplied, and, finally, to brave the authority of your Government.

Accept my esteem.

JH. FAUCHET.

P. S. You will remark, sir, that the letter of the vice consul of Norfolk remained twelve days without an answer; and that, when complaints are made against prizes taken by our cruisers, two hours are enough for even unjust seizures to take place.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PHILADELPHIA, October 2, 1794.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 1st instant, in which you are pleased to repeat the complaint contained in your letter of the 10th ultimo, against the English frigate Terpsichore, carrying into Norfolk, in Virginia, a prize, the French privateer La Mer. You remonstrate also upon the delay which the Governor of Virginia has shown in granting the relief required by the consul of the French republic, and desire to be informed of the instructions which have been given in this affair by the Executive of the United States, or at least of the issue of your application.

It was my intention to have replied to the case of the Terpsichore, in the answer which I propose to make to your letter of the 18th ult. But I have no hesitation in delivering it to you, as my opinion, that her coming into our ports with a prize is inadmissible by our treaty with France. It is more. It is contrary to the rules which have been long ago prescribed by the President of the United States to the government of the individual States, and which Governor Lee, in his letter of the 12th ult. to consul Oster, undertakes to execute.

From the circumstances, however, of Governor Lee being possessed of standing instructions and powers, adequate to exigency, and Mr. Oster having laid the matter before him, it could not be presumed that he had affected an unnecessary procrastination. Nor did you specify in your letter of the 18th ultimo, the interval between Mr. Oster's application and the retardment of Governor Lee's answer. Hence, as it was known to me that it would require some time for a letter to pass from Norfolk to Richmond, the seat of government, for an answer to be returned from Richmond to Norfolk, and for the usual interval of time for the possibility of the Governor's absence, (which now seems probable from an expression in his letter of the 19th ult. to Mr. Oster) I did not hold myself justified in expressing to him a suspicion of neglect. Without such a suspicion it would have been absolutely useless to address him, as he could have been merely instructed to make the necessary inquiries, and to fulfill the sense of the President; both which things he ought to accomplish, of course, upon being notified of the occasion.
As Governor Lee, in that letter of the 13th ultimo, promises to discharge the duties which are expected from him, I cannot doubt that he, or the Lieutenant Governor in his absence, has, before this day, completed the business, according to national faith.

But that there may not be any impediment to the gratification of your wishes, I have the pleasure of enclosing to you the copy of a letter, which will be despatched by the mail of to-morrow to the Executive of Virginia.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Secretary of State to the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia.

PHILADELPHIA, October 5, 1794.

SIR:

It is with great mortification that intelligence has been received at the Department of State, from the minister of the French republic, that the British frigate Terpsichore has carried, as prize, into Norfolk, or some of our ports in its new voyage, a British privateer, supported by the Montagne. Our heart with you, that the admission of a foreign ship of war under such circumstances. The rules which have been adopted by the President are point-ed on this particular subject. What is due to all nations, we ought faithfully to render to the British; what is beyond the rights of the law of nations, we are under no obligation to perform; especially towards the British shipping, which is hourly destroying our trade; and more especially in defiance of a treaty which ought to be held sacred.

It appears, sir, by a letter from Governor Lee to the French consul at Norfolk, on the 12th of September last, that he had undertaken to make the necessary inquiries into the fact, and to do what the nature of the case demanded. The minister of the French republic is uneasy at the delay of the Governor’s answer, and is led to apprehend, from thence, a more injurious delay in the effecting of the business. I have given him my ideas of the course of this affair, trusting and believing that the patriotism of the Executive of Virginia will not suffer this gross insult to her dignity.

Let me entreat you, sir, to exert the attachment, which I know your whole body to possess, to national faith, and to cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that the facts, as stated, shall be found to be accurate. I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR:

In proportion to the pain of complaining of the negligence and tardiness which are shown in many parts of the United States in the execution of the treaties which equally bind our two nations, is the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of the despatch in which I found expressed, with the energy of a friend, the intention of the Federal Government to maintain the engagements which it has contracted with the French republic. I observe to you, however, that this intention will produce no effect, if you are obliged to notify it to the Governors every time that hostile vessels, with their prizes, shall enter the ports from their cruise: for these vessels would then have time to take in provisions for themselves and their prizes before the order of departure (which ought to be given to them immediately, for fulfilling the object of the contracting parties) can be notified to them. It does not require a long time to make the researches necessary for determining whether a vessel puts in a harbor only by force of the dangers of the sea. This is a case in which a few hours suffice for obtaining information; and it appears to me that there is already a fault on the part of the Governors, or of those who are appointed to maintain the laws, that a demand must be made upon them for the execution of the instructions which they have received from their Government. They have failed in their duty, which prescribes a continual vigilance and attention to prevent any thing being done contrary to the laws or treaties of their country.

You will pardon, sir, these reflections, when you shall learn that an English frigate has just anchored in Hampton roads, with two French privateers, as prizes. If, on the very day of her arrival, she has not been directed to depart immediately; if there must have been long inquiries beforehand, and the consul must have written in the first instance, the English will have had time to revictual, and supply all their wants; and the article of our treaty, which, at first sight, seems necessarily to be so disadvantageous to them, will in no respect control their piracies.

To crown the system of robbery which they have invented, nothing more will be wanting than to carry into your ports the vessels which they shall have taken from yourselves; since they already conduct thither, in spite of your laws, those which they have taken from your allies. Accept, sir, my esteem.

SIR:

Although I cannot doubt that the treaties of the United States with France will be respected by your excellence, according to the obligations of good faith and sincere friendship, yet I must take the liberty of recommending to your particular attention the 17th article of the treaty of commerce. Mr. Fauchet, the minister of the French republic near the United States, apprehends, from circumstances which have been experienced, that, unless prompt and decisive measures are adopted, in the several ports, in regard to vessels hostile to the French nation, and bringing in French prizes, this branch of that treaty will become null. It cannot require much time to go through the necessary examinations; and, therefore, I must entreat your excellency to enter into such arrangements for the execution of this member of the treaty, and the correspondent rules of the President of the United States, as will effectively prevent, under those circumstances, hostile vessels from receiving comfort and succor, contrary to solemn stipulations. It will not escape your observation that, if adequate measures should be delayed, in the ports distant from your excellency, until you can be notified, and forward special instructions adapted to each case, the opportunity of enforcing the treaty will be lost. I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Philadelphia, October 19, 1794.

SIR: I do myself the honor of transmitting to you the copy of a letter from the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, in answer to mine of the 3d instant, upon the subject of the British frigate Terpsichore.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

Lieutenant Governor Wood to the Secretary of State.

Richmond, October 10, 1794.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant. I am not enabled, at present, to give you the information I could wish with respect to the British frigate the Terpsichore. Before the Governor left this place, he received the information which you mention, from the vice consul at Norfolk; and, in his character of commander in chief of the militia, assured Mr. Oster, in a letter of the 13th ultimo, that he would make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoin.” My not receiving any communications respecting the Governor's inquiries, I naturally concluded the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had complied with the injunction. I have now given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the militia at Norfolk, to make immediate inquiry into the facts, and report the same to the Executive; and that he, in the mean time, cause to be rendered to the republic of France that justice to which it is entitled. I have written to the vice consul on the subject, and have requested him to make me acquainted with all cases of a similar nature which may hereafter occur. I have the honor, &c.

JAMES WOOD.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph.

Philadelphia, the 12th Pluviose, (January 31, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: It is now the third time that English vessels, notwithstanding my representations, have anchored, with their prizes, in the Chesapeake. I am assured that the French corvette L'Esperance has been conducted into Lynhaven Bay by the Argonaut. The fact is, that the latter vessel sailed from the Chesapeake in order to capture the corvette belonging to the republic, returned after that expedition, and is even at this moment sheltered there. You assured me, sir, that the most positive orders had been given, to prevent future violations of the treaties notwithstanding that assurances, the outrage is again renewed, and, what is more, the English vessels, which should remain in your ports only to receive succor strictly necessary to enable them to gain the nearest national port, have remained stationary in them. At their return from a cruise on your coasts, where they capture your own vessels, they procure their provisions, their supplies, in the United States: and may, also, as has just happened, even when driven in by stress of weather, and when asylum is given to them, obstruct your and our commerce. In a word, they appear to be ramparts established to cut off all communication between your country and mine. This contravention of the contract which binds our two nations can no longer be tolerated. I expect, sir, your answer, that I may communicate to the French republic the motives for a conduct which will affect it so much the more, as heirs is all friendship, all justice, towards the United States.

Accept my respect.

JH. FAUCHET.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Department of State, February 1, 1795.

SIR: Permit me to refer to the enclosed copy of my letter to the Governor of Virginia for an answer to your favor of the 31st ultimo. Indeed, sir, if I could more strongly express to you the mortification which I have experienced from these events, I would do so: for I contemplate such a violation of our treaty with abhorrence.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

The Secretary of State to the Governor of Virginia.

Department of State February 1, 1795.

SIR: It is with the greatest regret that I am constrained to transmit to your excellency the enclosed copy of a letter from the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic. You will find, sir, that it contains most heavy complaints against the indulgence understood to have been shown, in the ports of Virginia, to British vessels of war, which have made prize of French ships. The files of the council of state will support me in representing to the minister, that I had taken the liberty of urging the Executive of Virginia, on the 3d and 10th of October last, to wipe away a similar imputation on our national faith. Not having been enabled to communicate to him any result, in consequence of those letters, I have felt great embarrassment how to answer him on the present occasion. But, sir, confiding in the patriotism of the Executive of Virginia, and being persuaded that it must be painful to them to tolerate the violation of our treaty with France, in so delicate a part, I shall assure him that the most speedy and effectual measures are recommended to your excellency.
Of those measures you are the best judge, being upon the spot, and within the reach of the most accurate information. But I cannot forbear to add, that, as delay must be destructive of the object, it will probably be advisable for your excellency to send down some confidential officer, who may act with promptness and decision, without encountering the inconvenience of being obliged to send and receive expressions to and from Richmond.

I beg the favor of your excellency’s immediate reply.

And have the honor to be, sir, &c.

EDMUND RANDOLPH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 24, 1795.

SIR:—I have the pleasure of transmitting to you copies of the despatches which I received by the last mail from the Governor of Virginia, relative to the complaint which I some time ago forwarded to him from you.

No. 54.

The Governor of Virginia to the Secretary of State.

RICHMOND, February 12, 1795.

SIR:—I am extremely concerned that any seeming inattention to the treaty of the United States with France should be attributed to the Executive of Virginia: I, however, flatter myself that an investigation of that subject will totally exculpate them from having, in any instance, authorized an imputation on our national faith. Although divested of effectual means to prevent, in all our ports, the acts of the citizens or subjects of the belligerent nations, which may contravene an article of the treaty, I trust the enclosed transcripts of the several and repeated letters and instructions on the subject will satisfy the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, as well as yourself, that the Executive have made every effort to render such instances as few as possible, and on every occasion to remedy them where they have occurred.

Of the act now particularly complained of by Mr. Fauchet, your letter of the 1st instant, with its enclosure, communicated to us the first information; nor will this be a matter of surprise, when the relative situation of Lynnhaven Bay is considered.

The information has now been submitted to the consideration of the Council of State, and that no delay may prevent the application of such remedy as is attainable, and the circumstances of the case may, on further investigation indicate, they have advised that I shall become personally the agent in the business: in consequence of which, I intend to set out to-morrow for Norfolk, and, on my return, or, as soon as the object of my journey is at all effected, you may expect a further communication respecting it.

In the mean time, I must request you will be so obliging as to make Mr. Fauchet acquainted with the step determined on, as well as the contents of the enclosed, and assure him, that, independent of their sense of national dignity, and the obligation arising from particular stipulations, the Executive of Virginia will never want inclination to render to the French republic every act of friendship as well as justice, which is compatible with their political situation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CIRCULAR.

To the Commandants of Counties in which are Ports of Navigation.

RICHMOND, June 8, 1793.

SIR:—The President of the United States having called on me, in my character of commander-in-chief of the militia of this State, to be ready to suppress any attempt or attempts which may be made, within the limits thereof, to violate the neutrality he has declared in behalf of the people of the United States towards the belligerent Powers, I consider it my duty to communicate the same to the commandants of the militia of those counties whose local situation may require it; together with the sentiments expressed by the President on this occasion.

He has declared that the treaty existing between the United States and France, and the treaty existing between the United States and Holland, do not authorize those Powers to arm vessels within our ports; therefore, any attempt on the part of the belligerent Powers, or their subjects, so to do, will be a violation of the neutrality.

In all such cases, you will, therefore, be pleased to interpose with your militia, seizing and detaining any vessel which you may find, within the limits of your county, commissioned, equipped, and manned as a privateer, on behalf of any of the belligerent Powers, or of their subjects; and you will also interpose in all acts of hostility which may happen between the belligerent Powers, detaining the party first aggressing.

In any event of this sort, you will be so good, without loss of time, to communicate the case to me, with all the evidence legally taken in writing, appertaining thereto, that I may transmit the same to the President of the United States, whose decision, when known to me, will be forwarded to you.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

To the Commandants of Counties in which are Ports of Navigation.

RICHMOND, August 22, 1793.

SIR:—It having been decided by the President of the United States that no armed vessel, which has been, or shall be, originally fitted out, in any port of the United States, as a cruiser or privateer, by either of the parties at war, is to have asylum in any of the ports of the United States, in case any vessel within the foregoing description should arrive in any port or harbor within the limits of your county, you are to cause her to be ordered to depart immediately, and in case of her refusal, you are to take effectual measures to oblige her to depart. Force is not to be resorted to, until every proper effort has been previously made to procure the early departure without it. If any such vessel or vessels shall have sent or brought, subsequent to the 5th instant, or should hereafter send or bring any prize or prizes into any port or harbor within your county, you will cause such prize or prizes to be immediately se- cured by the militia, for the purpose of being restored to the former owners. The following are the names of the privateers comprehended within the meaning of this letter, that have hitherto come to the knowledge of the Government of the United States:

Citizen Genet, Fitted out at Charleston, S. C.
Sans Culotte, Vainqueur de Bastile,
Petit Democrat, fitted out at Philadelphia.
Carnaille, fitted out at Delaware.

You will be pleased to transmit in writing to the Governor, all the cases, with the evidences thereon, which may occur in pursuance of this communication.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to the Vice Consul of the French republic at Norfolk.

Richmond, October 9, 1794.

Sir:

The communications made by you to the Governor, respecting the British frigate the Terpsichore, he took up as commander-in-chief of the militia, before he left this place; and, I presume, instituted the inquiries which he promised to make in his letter to you of the 13th ult. As the result of those inquiries were not communicated to me, I concluded the British frigate had been ordered to depart, and had done so. I have just now received a letter from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the Terpsichore, and have given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the Norfolk militia, on the subject of it, and which were requested of him to communicate to you.

I entreat, sir, that you will be so obliging as to make me acquainted, without loss of time, of all cases of a similar nature which may hereafter occur, and hope that you will be persuaded I shall always feel a particular gratification, on all occasions, to render to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled.

No. 58.

The Lieutenant Governor of Virginia to Thomas Newton, Esq. commandant of the militia of Norfolk.

In Council, 9th of October, 1794.

Sir:

I have received a letter from the Secretary of State, dated the 3d instant, stating that he had been informed, by the minister of the French republic, that the British frigate the Terpsichore had carried as prize into Norfolk, or some of our ports, the French privateer la Montagne. Our treaty with France positively forbids the admission of foreign ships of war, under such circumstances. The rules, which have been adopted by the President are pointed on this particular subject. Those rules have been communicated to you by the Governor’s circular of the 5th of December last, to which I beg leave to refer. What is beyond the rights of the law of nations, we are under no obligation to perform, especially towards the British, who are hourly destroying our trade; and more especially, in defiance of a treaty which it will be held sacred.

I beg, sir, that you will, as commandant of the Norfolk militia, be pleased to inquire into this case, as well as all others of a similar nature, and report the same to the Executive, with all possible dispatch; and that you will, in the mean time, cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that the facts, as stated, shall be found to be accurate. This case was taken up by the Governor, in his character of commander-in-chief of the militia, before he left this place, upon the representation of the vice consul of Norfolk. I find by the Governor’s letters to Mr. Oster of the 12th ult. that he assures him, “he will make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President’s instructions enjoin.” Not having received any communications respecting the inquiries made by the Governor, I naturally concluded the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had done so.

May I beg the favor of you to communicate the contents of this letter to Mr. Oster, and to Mr. William Lindsay, the collector of the port of Norfolk.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Sir:

The minister of the republic of France is apprehensive, from circumstances which have been experienced, that, unless decisive measures are adopted with respect to vessels hostile to the French nation, bringing into our ports, French prizes, the 17th article of the treaty of commerce will become null.

I beg, sir, to call your particular attention to that branch of the treaty, as well as to the correspondant rules of the President of the United States, communicated to you in the Governor’s letter of the 9th of December last; trusting that you will pursue measures to that effect as prompt, and under those circumstances, hostile vessels from receiving comfort or succor, contrary to solemn stipulations.

Lieut. Colonel Willis Wilson to the Governor of Virginia.

Portsmouth, January 3, 1795.

Sir:

I beg leave to enclose your excellency a copy of a note from the British consul to the collector of the customs of this port. The collector, it seems, thought himself unwarranted to do any thing in the business. I was applied to by an officer of the customs respecting the consul’s request, or demand, and conceived it my duty to give orders to the commandant of the forts not to suffer the frigates to pass until your excellency’s orders were had thereon. It is also my duty, for the sake of tranquility, peace, and order, to make known, that the commandant of this Britannic Majesty’s ships have rendered themselves very obnoxious to the citizens of these two towns, as well as others, by lawless depredations on their property, and tyrannical impressions of native seamen; that there now lie at our wharves three French ships of war, with crews to amount of six or seven hundred men; the British ships in question, if allowed to come up, must also lay at the wharves, to go through their repairs; consequently the necessary subordination cannot be had, by the officers of either party, over their seamen; I am, therefore, very apprehensive, in such case, of dangerous consequences. In short, I think it very imprudent in the British to throw themselves in a port where there will be so great a majority of people with whom they are at war: for it is not in the power of all neutral ports to keep order, or protect their neutrality; I am sure it is not the case with this. If, therefore, they are entitled to repairs in our ports, I humbly conceive Yorktown, or any other port where there may not be so large a concourse of French citizens, a much more eligible place for them.

I will be very thankful to your excellency for advice, whether the brigadiers have an existing command over the respective counties, or whether that command is vested in the lieutenant colonels, and the brigadier generals confined to the brigades?

I have the honor to be, &c.

Sir: The letter which you addressed to the Governor, the 3d instant, has been received by me, and submitted to the consideration of the council of State. The board conceived that ships of war, circumstanced as those mentioned by the British consul, may be permitted to enter our ports, and to make the necessary repairs to fit them for sea; provided they have not made prizes of the subjects, people, or property, of France, and 'coming with their prizes into the ports of the United States. If any circumstances should occur, which may be subservient of the tranquility of the place, the law gives you ample powers to call forth the militia for the suppression of it.

The Secretary of State to the Governors of the several States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 6, 1795.

Sir: As it is contrary to the law of nations that any of the belligerent Powers should commit hostility on the waters which are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, so ought not the ships of war, belonging to any belligerent Power, to take a station in those waters in order to carry on hostile expeditions from thence. I do myself the honor, therefore, of requesting of your excellency, in the name of the President of the United States, that, as often as a fleet, squadron, or ship, of any belligerent nation, shall clearly and unequivocally use the rivers, or other waters of the United States, as a station, in order to carry on hostile expeditions from thence, you will cause to be notified to the commander thereof, that the President deems such conduct to be contrary to the rights of our neutrality; and that a demand of retribution will be urged upon their Government for prizes which may be made in consequence thereof. A standing order to this effect may probably be advantageously placed in the hands of some confidential officer of the militia; and I must entreat you to instruct him to write by the mail to this Department, immediately upon the happening of any case of the kind.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 64.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 13th Floréal, (May 2, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: On the 24th of February last I received the copy of the despatch which the Governor of Virginia transmitted to you. Doubtless your object, as well as his, was to prove the exertions made use of to satisfy the reclamations which I have raised against the violation of our treaties, three times repeated in the Chesapeake. I was not a little astonished to see, among the documents you sent me as a proof of those exertions, the description pronounced in 1793 against French vessels armed in the ports of the United States. I do not require this order of the Government to be persuaded of the promptitude with which Justice is done to the complaints of English agents.

Since my arrival here, a single allegation from them, whether founded or not, has been sufficient for causing the prizes of our privateers to be arrested, which our treaties sheltered from every kind of prosecution; and, far from using the same coercive means towards the English, when they sent prizes made upon us into your ports, even the severity which your treaties with us impose, has not been exercised towards them. In a word, the militia have, as yet, been assembled only to support the detention of French vessels or of their prizes so that, on a single suspicion, the requisitions of the English have been obeyed, and we, with positive facts, have not been able to obtain justice. I waited the effect of the promises made to you by Mr. Brooke, in his letter of the 13th of February last. After an anxiety of two months, far from receiving the satisfaction which I had a right to expect, I am informed that a French privateer and two of her prizes have just been carried into Hampton. I hesitate, sir, to testify to you my indignation against this new audacity on the part of the English, at the very moment when their Government is boasting of having become the friend of your country, and that hesitation arose from the little success produced by my reiterated complaints. I once more recall them to you here, sir, and may this be the last time that I shall fulfill that painful duty.

I claimed the execution of our treaties, violated by the putting into Norfolk of ships which captured American and French vessels, laden with provisions, and bound to France, under convoy of the Concord. Far from according to my demand, you took the trouble to interpret the treaty in favor of your enemies, and that favorable interpretion could no longer detain a single vessel of the capturing division, even, since in your construction, it had contravened the 17th article of your treaty with France, by taking into Hampton the privateer la Montagne, &c. Governor Lee did not, till after some time, answer the claim of the consul of the republic in Virginia, and contented himself with making some vague promises, of which you yourself, sir, have never yet discovered the effect. Mr. Lee, doubtless, supposed that his promise alone should content and satisfy the just claims of the agents of the French republic, since he has not thought proper to inform his own Government of the measures he was to take for accomplishing his promise given to fulfill the instructions of the President.

Soon after, I had a new opportunity of reiterating to the Executive of the United States my hitherto fruitless complaints against the violation of our treaties: an English vessel, which had put into Hampton, quitted that port on the information of a pilot, in order to go and capture L'Esperance, a corvette of the republic, and an American vessel which appeared in the opening of the bay; she again entered the bay with the corvette: re-armed her there; and sent her out on a cruise. I protested against this flagrant infraction, and was still answered by promises; and these promises are not yet fulfilled. The Argonaut is also permitted with impunity to defy your magistrates, who, doubtless, required her to go out, that being their duty. Further: the Thesis, on returning from her piracies against your own vessels, is permitted to repair to your ports the considerable damages which she received in the arbor of her pursuit, whilst the 17th article of your treaty is formally opposed to it, as well as to the asylum which you allowed, in general, to Admiral Murray's division: for, in a word, sir, all the vessels composing this division have taken French and American vessels, under the single pretext that they were laden with French property. Whether the allegation, as to the latter, be true or false, the captors should be driven from your ports. If they have robbed you, one does not receive brigands in the house they have pillaged. If they have seized our property, our treaty is pointed in that respect.

After so many useless efforts, sir, you must be sensible of the pain I experience in tracing to you a picture, so different from that offered by the French republic, whenever justice towards you is in question, even though your interests are compromised. It was when a terrible war was incessantly devouring her that she rigorously fulfilled her treaties with you; in this instance she demands but justice, and cannot obtain it. On the contrary, she sees her enemies admitted to an intimacy with you at the moment in which your commerce and your sovereignty are alike insulted by them; at the moment when, adding denial to injustice, they despoil you anew upon the seas; when they promise to indemnify you for former acts. This reflection, sir, becomes much more grievous when we see posted up under your eyes the official legalisation of a proclamation, which prohibits your commerce with our ports, and which alone you know the law of nations. You know, sir, what respect imposes on us as to what immediately interests your affairs and your relations as a people; but I cannot entirely pass in silence the traite du commerce, to which the republic is no stranger, because they are directed against her; and that, to subscribe by an excess of courtesy to such orders, were to quit the neutral position which the Americans profess. Examine, I pray you, sir, whether this neutrality can be said to exist when, on the one hand, you can no longer maintain your treaties; and on the other, you are obliged to abandon your relations exclusively to the discretion of England, who doubtless will soon declare all the universe blockaded, except her possessions. What account do you conceive I can render to the French Government of the means you take for rendering your neutrality respectable? Yet, on that, my instructions insist, and it is on that, more especially, that France is uneasy. I shall not remind you of the conversations which I have had the honor of having with you on this subject; still less should I call to your recollection the verbal promises which you have repeatedly made, especially at a certain period of a more honorable state of things, which I have not the least hope of seeing the like again. But, I repeat, that America now knows the result of this measure. The same acts which produced it still exist, since it has taken a form which at first was not announced, but from which, moreover, much had been expected.

I hasten, sir, to quit a subject which I began but with pain, and with respect to which I know my obligations. I return to what I was desirous of bringing to your attention.

I hope, therefore, sir, that the Executive of the United States will not be satisfied under its treaty concluded with England, since every thing proves that that measure is insufficient. I likewise hope that your ports will henceforward be shut against vessels which enter them in contravention of the treaties uniting our two nations. I also hope, that the President, who has so often promised me through you that he would support the treaties still exist, will give orders that his intentions, upon which I have not the shadow of a doubt, be finally fulfilled; in a word, I hope that my claims, so often and so many times repeated, will be attended to, so much the more as they are just, and as for several months I have not ceased to present them to the cold impartiality of your Government.

Accept, sir, &c.

J. H. FAUCHET.

No. 65.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 4th Prorial, May 23, 1795, O. S.

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: It is now twenty-one days since I had the honor of writing to you, and eight since you promised an answer to my letter. It gives me pain to be obliged to remind you of this promise. An event announced in the gazettes proves how much the complaints I have made required an immediate attention. If, against the tenor of the treaties which I have hitherto invoked in vain, an English fleet, employed upwards of ten months at the entrance of your ports, intercepting French property, real or supposed, and even frequently conducting prizes into your bays, had not received a constant asylum in the United States, with the liberty of supplying themselves with provisions and of repairing their vessels in the Chesapeake bay, I should have expected the common sense of a merchant vessel in the Chesapeake bay, I should have expected the common sense of a merchant.

I experience unpleasant sensations, sir, when I observe that such vessels are repeatedly repaired on your coasts only as the sequel to the violation of our treaties, notwithstanding my reiterated representations; and notwithstanding the religious punctuality with which the French republic keeps her engagements with a nation to whom she has not ceased to testify her attachment.

Accept, sir, my esteem,

J. H. FAUCHET.

No. 66.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 29, 1795.

SIR: As soon as I had submitted to the President of the United States your letter of the 3d instant, with which I was honored on the 4th, I instructed me to search the files of my office, and in the course of examination, what he has done on every other of a similar nature. This has been to weigh the complaints of foreign ministers with temper and impartiality; to explain misconceptions with frankness; to rectify real errors; to compensate where compensation was due, but to stand firm to the imperious dictates of national honor.

I have obeyed his command, with an anxiety to convince the French republic that we have kept pace with our obligations, but with a resolution to rest my reply upon facts, simple and unstrained, and upon reasoning, seeking no lustre from a fervency of style. This, sir, is the result.
First. The order of 1793, prohibiting "the original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States by any of the belligerent parties, for military service, offensive or defensive," was transmitted to you, as a part of the several instructions, from the Governor of this State, after an interval of time which seems to me more remote from my imagination, than that this order could awaken the discontent which generated the early discussions with your predecessor. It was announced to Mr. Genet in May of that year; and its principle has never been since assailed, as far as I recollect. Now, the author of the present paper, which I am writing, to order a letter in Paris on the 16th of August, 1793, which was communicated to the French Executive, assigns to this subject a prominent rank for consideration. Permit me, therefore, to refer you to a letter from this Department to Mr. Genet, on the 5th of June, 1793, wherein you will find the decided sense of the President, regarding the arming and equipping of vessels and privateers by the neutral vessels, with whom they are at peace, is incompatible with the territorial sovereignty of the United States; that it makes them instrumental to the annoyance of those nations; and thence the policy of compromising their arms. Permit me also to refer you to an act of Congress on the 5th of June, 1793, which makes it a penal offense to furnish, fit, or arm, or to employ in the service of any foreign Prince or State, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or properties, of another foreign Prince or State, under the pretense of the laws of war, or of defense, of the United States. Both of these acts were made the foundation of our countermanding orders.

To open afresh the disagreeable scenes of that day, is a task which we did not expect, after the disapprobation manifested by your republic towards the chief actor; and more especially after the forbearance of the President, who, having no personal impulse to indulgence, discovered, as is known, sir, to you, no desire to embrace the opportunity presented by the recent events, in order to give them a farther turn. The order ought to become exceptional to one nation, because, by its operation, "right" is done to another, we still hold it to be reconcilable with unalloyed faith and essential to an honest neutrality.

If French armaments in our ports, in the principally, are but a promissory note of the order; if the execution of it has been prompt; it is because, in the one instance, an expedients remedy was practicable; and in the other, scarcely any but French cruisers were attempted to be there equipped; although examples are not wanting of British cruisers being in like manner disarmed. Every contrast, therefore, is unbounded between our presumed rapidity of motion and the tardy fact that precedes order.

Second. But, sir, you have drawn a conclusion, inadmissible by us, under any aspect. You have ventured to intimate a predilection in our Government for Great Britain; and to fortify the insinuation by these suggestions: 1st. That, "ever since you have been here, a single allegation has been made by the French cruisers, or vessels made by your privateers, although our treaties should shelter them from every pursuit." 2d. That, "far from using the same means of coercion towards the English, when they send into our ports the prizes made from the French, the rigor our treaties demand has not been exercised." 3d. That, "a contrary is to have as yet been exhibited only in the cases of cruisers, and not to France." 4th. That, "under our eyes is fixed the official legalization of a proclamation, which interdicts to us a commerce with your colonies, and suspends as to us alone the law of nations." 5th. And 6th. That, "the United States quit the neutrality which they profess, by subscribing, through an excess of circumspection, (management) to a mandate like this, and by being unable, on the one side, to maintain their treaties, and by being obliged, on the other, to abandon theirs, relations exclusively to the discretion of England." You lastly allude to our treaty with Great Britain, as if it riveted the suspicions, so profluently strewn in every page of your letter.

First. If the nature of the French prizes, which have been arrested by virtue of instructions from our Government, is the same, this the mode placed of the arrest, and the issue of the examination, were now within my reach, each of them would be brought to the test. But, not being individually remembered, they shall be classed under three heads: 1st. Those made by illegal privateers; 2d. Those made by lawful cruisers; and 3d. Those by lawful cruisers of the high seas.

1st. The seizure of prizes, made by illegal privateers, was the effect of necessity; having been postponed until the injunctions against those cruisers have been often andflagrantly continued. No precaution was spared to prevent an unjust detentions. The Executive of the United States, the Government, or some officer acting under the one or the other, passed their judgment upon the probability and necessity of the cause of arrest, in the first stage of the business, and the final decision was always dispassionate and deliberate what better security, situated as our country

2d. Small is the number of captures within the jurisdiction of the United States. The Grange, which was restored, for this cause, to her former British owners, has long ceased to be a topic of controversy; and if any other example of restitution shall be adduced, I pledge myself to prove its propriety. The William, of Glasgow, was, indeed, after remaining for 17 months, determined to be a prize of war, and it was difficult to fix the preponderance of either scale. By imposing on the claimant, according to strict law, the burthen of maintaining his own pretensions, and by repudiating testimony which was excepted from a defect of character in the witness, but from a critical application of judicial maxims, the captors regained their prize. Nor did we stop here; the discharges incurred by our Government, easy to be justified, shall be liquidated.

3d. As to prizes, made by legal cruisers on the high seas, it never was the intention of the President to interfere, he having abstained (as the seventeenth article of our treaty of commerce imports) from examining into their lawfulness; the instructions may be ascribed any vexation of genuine prizes, they may, perhaps, have been mistaken for prizes of the two foregoing obnoxious kinds. But even for these mistakes we ought not to be questioned, until they shall have been notified to us, and satisfaction has been refused.

Mr. President, your instructions may be awarded prince by prince, and not before them, is not denied. But the cases have been stated to be generally of this description; the captured property has been supposed to belong to our own citizens, or national nations. The proprietors could not be silent spectators of their ruin, but addressed us courts. The captors were summoned and insisted that, by the law of nations, they were entitled to the prizes. Some justice added to this argument, others repelled it. But it has been since naturally settled by the supreme court of the United States, that relief ought to be administered, where it is bona fide preyed. If it were otherwise, the substance of our citizens would be the sport and plunder of every sea rover who carried a French commission in his pocket. The treaty sheds prizes from this denomination, not restrain our own citizens, or from other neutral people. Further than to rescue captures of this denomination, it is not con-
FRANCE.

There was, indeed, once a room to fear that clamours sometimes embraced the double chance of executive and judicial redress. But the provision which in this manner this manœuvre was counteracted by my letter to you, and to the President on the 22d of October, 1791.

Second. Your next impituation is, that, "far from using the same means of coercion towards the English, when they send into our ports prizes made from the French, the rigor which our treaties demand has not been exercised." The exceptions, and the citations of cases, are well known, which had captured American and French bottoms, laden with provision for France, under the convoy of the Commander; and in the squadron of Admiral Murray putting into the harbor of Norfolk, and enjoying an asylum therein: 2d, In the British frigate Terpsichore coming into Hampton with the declaration of war to France; 3d, In another squadron, the privateer, La Esperance, a corvette of the French republic, and an American vessel, both of which were discovered at the opening of the bay; returning with the corvette into the Chesapeake, re-arming her, sending her out to cruises; and receiving the prize which she had taken of two British vessels upon our pirates on their own vessels, to repair completely, in our ports, the heavy damage she had sustained in the arduous pursuit.

1st. Unless contrary to what France observes, the granting of access to the public armed vessels of the nations with whom we have signed peace, custom has established that they may enter our ports, impelled by necessity, or induced by comfort or convenience. This was announced by the Executive on the 9th of September, 1793.

Notwithstanding that treaty, it has not yet been disputed that the same allowance may be extended to the enemies of France" who have established French property or people. But, on the 3d of August, 1793, the President declared his construction of that treaty, to be, that no public armed vessels were thereby forbidden from our waters, except those which should have made prize of the people or property of France, coming with their prizes, although, when you allude to my letter of the 7th of September, 1794, which was occasioned by yours of the 21st August, 1794, and drew forth a reply on the 16th of September, 1794, you insinuate that "pains have been taken by me to interpret the treaty in favor of your enemies;" yet, was it an interpretation advised by all the heads of departments, and the attorney general, with whom the President was in the habit of consulting? You differ from us in the construction. What is to follow? Nothing, I trust and believe, between our two Governments, which is so full of discord between us as to constitute us to be separated from one another, as different as any Government construes differently from that to which he is sent, the treaties, which are to form a common rule of action for both, it would be unjust in either to claim an exclusive right of construction. Each nation has an equal right to expound the treaty in such a manner as shall most completely and perfectly establish its native, source, and understand train of proceeding. It is the right and duty of the foreign missionary to urge his own constructions; to support them with reasons which may convince, and in terms of decency and respect, which may reconcile the Government of the country to a concurrence. It is the duty of that Government to listen to his reasonings with attention; to lay the rights of its own country and of its own understanding of the treaty on their side, follows, of necessity, that, exercising the sovereign powers of the country, they have a right to proceed on their own constructions and conclusions, as to whatever is to be done within their limits. The minister then returns to his own Government, to ask new instructions, and, in the mean time, acquiesce in the authority of the country. His Government examines his constructions; abandons them, if wrong, insists on them, if right; and the case then becomes a matter of negotiation between the two nations."

This quotation is from the letter which conveyed to the French republic the sensations of our Government towards Mr. Genet. To its terms we shall be always willing to conform, and, if contrary to our present impressions, the treaty with France, which we deem sacred, shall appear to your republic to require the expulsion of every British ship of war, which may have taken a French prize in any part of the world, let us be convinced, and we will renounce the ancient opinion, and full would be our right.

Thus thinking, we could not banish that part of Admiral Murray's squadron, which had not come in with French prizes. But if they have used the waters of the United States as a station, from whence to carry on hostile expeditions, they will fall within the animadversions of the President's order on the 16th ultimo; and when the facts shall be ascertained, he will not be backward in supplanting his declarations.

Second. The British frigate Terpsichore is considered by you as offending our own interpretation of the treaty, and being nevertheless tolerated in our ports. We will, therefore, trace the transactions concerning her to their origin.

On the 18th of September, 1794, you represented to me, in a letter received on the 20th, that "she had cast anchor at Norfolk with the French privateer La Montagne, which she had taken; that the consul of the French republic had written to the Governor of Virginia to complain of this infraction, and a long time had elapsed without the Governor replying to his letter; the 1of October, 1794, you wrote, dated on the 13th of September, to the letter of the French consul, saying that "he would with very great pleasure make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoin." At the same time you request the instructions of the President to the Governor, or at least the issue of your reclamation of 1794. I am directed by the President to tell you that the situation of the 17th and 20th of October, 1794, is quite critical. It has been necessary to rely on writings of the moment, as expositors of the sentiments then prevailing. I hope to be excused for transmitting here portions of my answer to you on the 2d of October, and my letter on the next day to the Governor of Virginia. The President's instructions to the Terpsichore are delivered in this letter to your letter of the 15th ultimo. But I have no hesitation in delivering it to you, as my opinion, that her coming into our ports with a prize, is inadmissible by our treaty with France. It is more. It is contrary to the rules which have been long ago prescribed by the President of the United States, to the Governors of the individual States, and with Governor Lee, in his letter of the 12th ultimo, to consul Oster, who undertakes to execute.

"From the circumstances, however, of Governor Lee been possessing of standing instructions and powers, adequate to the exigency, and of Mr. Oster having laid the matter before him, it could not be presumed that he had not already been instructed in the proper letter for the 17th ultimo. You spoke to your letter of 22d ultimo, to consul Oster, in the President's application to the retirement of Governor Lee's answer. Hence, as it was known to me that it would require some time for a letter to pass from Norfolk to Richmond, for the seat of government, for an answer to be returned from Richmond to Norfolk, and for the usual allowance for the possibility of the Governor's absence, it was necessary to give the 17th of October, 22d of October, 1794, as the time for a letter from the President of the 17th ultimo. You spoke, I am not certain, in expressing to him a suspicion of neglect. Without such a suspicion, it would have been absolutely useless to address him, as he could have been merely instructed to make the necessary inquiries, and to fulfill the sense of the President, both which things he ought to accomplish of course, upon being notified of the facts in question. We cannot, for my part, believe, that his neglect, or negligence, or the absence of the Governor, is a matter of such great consequence as to be any imputation to the gratification of your wishes, I have been so fortunate to make the pleasure to you the copy of a letter, which will be dispatched by the mail of to-morrow to the Executive of Virginia."
The minister of the French republic is uneasy at the delay of the Governor's answer, and is led to apprehend from his silence and delay that some of the advice which he is desirous of obtaining of the Executive, as the government of the republic, is not likely to receive the attention due to it. The French minister has written to the Governor to this effect, assuring him that his mission was charged with the importance of the affair, trusting and believing that the policy of the Executive of Virginia will not suffer this gross insult to its treaty.

Let me entreat you, sir, to exert the attachment, which I know your whole body to possess, to national faith, and to cause to be rendered to the French republic that justice to which it is entitled, upon the presumption that it is entitled to our friendship and protection.

Upon these letters you were pleased, on the 6th of October, 1794, to make the following comments: "In proportion to the pain of complaining of the negligence and tardiness which are shown in many parts of the United States, and especially in the execution of the treaty of 1778, there is a new and alarming instance of a failure of the treaty in the receipt of the despatch, in which I find expressed, with the energy of a friend, the intention of the Federal Government to maintain the engagements which it has contracted with the French republic. I observe to you, however, that this intention will produce no effect, if you are obliged to notify it to the Governors every time that hostile vessels are received on their coasts, and compelled to take time to take in provisions for themselves and their prizes before the order of departure, which ought to be given to them immediately, for fulfilling the object of the contracting parties, can be notified to them. It does not require a long time to make these researches necessary; and the Federal authorities do not have force of the danger to make a law which a few hours suffice for obtaining information, and it appears, therefore, that there is already a fault on the part of the officers, or of those who are appointed to maintain the laws, that a demand must be made upon them for the execution of the instructions which they have received from their Government. Why have they fixed you, in the treaty, which describes a continual vigilance and attention, to prevent anything being done, contrary to the laws or treaties of their country. You will pardon, sir, these reflections, when you shall learn that an English frigate has just anchored in Hampton Roads with two French privateers, as prizes. If, on the very day of her arrival, she has not been directed to depart immediately; if there must have been long inquiries beforehand, and the convey must have written in the first instance, the English will have had time to revisit, and supply all their wants; and the article of our treaty, which at first sight seems necessarily to be so disadvantageous to them, will in no respect control their piracies. To crown the system of robbery which they have invented, nothing more will now be required of your citizens, than that they carry the ports to their own persons, or yourselves; since they already conduct thither, in spite of your laws, those which they have taken from your allies.

That your suggestion was not forgotten is demonstrated by my circular letter to the Governors on the 10th of October, 1794, a copy of which I had the honor of enclosing to you on the same day, in these words: "Although I cannot answer a demand of this kind, immediately, in every part of the States where the treaty of 1778 is the basis of the obligations of good faith and sincere friendship, yet I must take the liberty of recommending to you, my particular attention, the 17th article of the treaty of commerce. Mr. Fauchet, the minister of the French republic near the United States, appointed, from considerations that have been published, and which have been the occasion of mature consideration in the several ports, in regard to vessels hostile to the French nation, and bringing in French prizes, that branch of that treaty will become null. It cannot require much time to go through the necessary examinations; and, therefore, I must entreat your excellency to enter into such arrangements for the execution of this member of the treaty, and the correspondent rules of the President of the United States, as will effectively prevent, under those circumstances, hostile vessels from receiving comfort and succor, contrary to solemn stipulations. It will not escape your observation, that, if adequate measures should be entered into, the ports distant from your excellency, until you can be notified, and forward special instructions adapted to each case, the opportunity of enforcing the treaty will be lost."

On the 10th of October, the lieutenant governor of Virginia acknowledges the receipt of mine of the 3d, and proceeds: "That he was not able at present to give me the information he could wish, with respect to the British frigate that had been ordered to depart before the 25th of the same month, the left in Norfolk, and that he had informed the vice consul at Norfolk, and, in his character of commander-in-chief of the militia, assured Mr. Oster, in a letter of the 12th ultimo, that he would make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoined; that, not receiving any communications respecting the Governor's inquiries, he naturally concluded that the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had complied with the injunction; but he had now given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the militia at Norfolk to make immediate inquiry into the facts, and report the same to the Executive; and, in the mean time, to cause to be rendered to the republic of France that justice to which it was entitled that he had written to the vice consul on the subject, and he requested to know the reason of the Lieutenant Governor acquainted with all cases of a similar nature, which might thereafter occur." A copy of this letter I had the honor of transmitting to you on the 19th of October, 1794.

The lieutenant governor had given, on the 9th of October, 1794, positive instructions to the purport promised, as in a circular letter to the Governor, to Mr. Thomas Nelson, Governor of Virginia, on the 24th of the same month, he directed the commandants of the militia of the borough of Norfolk, and the counties of Norfolk and Elizabeth City, effectually to execute my letter of the 10th of October, 1794, by preventing vessels in the predicament described from receiving comfort or succor.

I ask: Did the Lieutenant Governor Wood truly conjectured that he had departed. For she sailed, certainly, before the 28th of September, 1794, and, very probably, about the 20th, and it is not understood that she has returned.

In the absence of facts, will you find a vestige of British prepossession? Is it in the interpretation which we have given to the 17th article of the treaty? We are still persuaded of its soundness. Until we be convinced of an error, bound, as we are, by the law of nations, to sit as an independent umpire between the pretensions of the belligerent parties, relative to ourselves, we are bound by conscience to obey our own understanding. Is it in the Federal Executive not having employed the most effectual means in his power? He was induced to act by the Governments, the district attorneys, the collectors of the customs, and he appointed the militia for important exigencies. Is it because our nation, as yet far below the zenith of its future power, cannot summon into action a navy wherewith to sustain these intrusions? It could be extravagant. Is it because we do not learn, in an instant, that from the vice consul at Norfolk, and, in his character of commander-in-chief of the militia, assured Mr. Oster, in a letter of the 12th ultimo, that he would make the necessary inquiries, and then pursue the conduct which the President's instructions enjoined; that, not receiving any communications respecting the Governor's inquiries, he naturally concluded that the frigate had been ordered to depart, and had complied with the injunction; but he had now given the most pointed instructions to the commandant of the militia at Norfolk to make immediate inquiry into the facts, and report the same to the Executive; and, in the mean time, to cause to be rendered to the republic of France that justice to which it was entitled that he had written to the vice consul on the subject, and he requested to know the reason of the Lieutenant Governor acquainted with all cases of a similar nature, which might thereafter occur.”
Here, without censure, might the Governor have avoided his investigation: but being no lukewarm pursuer of truth, he proceeded further. "Being informed that a pilot from Norfolk (a man of respectable character) was well acquainted with the circumstances of the capture, and his absence preventing the Governor from then availing himself of his information, as I had taken leave of him, I wrote to Mr. Murray: thereon, pursuant to the foregoing letter, Mr. Cowper and myself called upon the captain of the French corvette taken off the coast last January, and requested him a statement of the circumstances relative to his being captured. He at first appeared willing to comply with our wishes, but as the day for the close of the Court of Enquiry was to appear, he was afterwards applied to, severally, by Mr. Cowper and myself, when he discovered a degree of reserve, for which we could not readily account, on the same day, that he, immediately on his arrival at this place, (Norfolk) rendered to the French consul a full and circumstantial account of that transaction."

"This deposition, or rather this circumstantial statement of the affair, was of such a veracity, that no word could be extracted, which did not extenuate the capture, where were the agents of Government next to look for evidence? The last hope was in a pilot named Butler; the material part of whose affidavit has been forwarded to you. He deposes that, on his arrival in Lynhaven Bay, as before related, (about the beginning of January,) he was told by a sloop of war, (the Espérance, prize, also under the administration of Admiral Murray,) that he understood from the officers and people on board the Resolution, that the said sloop of war had been taken some days before, brought to where she then lay, and there valued or appraised; that the admiral took her to him— with their prize valuation or appraisal; that the said prize sloop of war the Espérance was then and there manned and fitted for a cruise: that offers were made to him, the deponent, by the admiral himself, to engage as a pilot for said sloop of war during her intended cruise on the coast, which offers he, this deponent, rejected; and that, when he was at length permitted to leave the Resolution, in order to return home, the prize sloop of war the Espérance was still moored in Lynhaven Bay."

"The language of the French vice consul, after a full conference with the captain of the corvette, the captain's proclamations, promise, and breach of promise, as to testimony, and some other circumstances, had admonished us to a more careful investigation of Mr. Murray's story, and of the account of our possession, and too plainly develops the sincerity of our Government, to be omitted, were it not that its length, and that of the letters associated with it, that the copies of them be detached from the body of this."

"On the 5th instant, Mr. Hammond transmitted to me a counter declaration of Butler, to the following purport: "The French promised to give me knowledge of the war ports to which, they had not made known her as a pilot for the coast was made to be told by Admiral Murray: that he never deposed to many of the articles said to have been sworn to by him: that he can neither read nor write, but, from what he has heard, he presumes Mr. Bedinger has been很是 much, that the Harmony has been seized by the British, when he asked whether it was on the day of her detention or a day afterwards, he cannot determine."

"I therefore thought it expedient to forward to Mr. Bedinger what he had said, and told him it was the Governor's desire he should deposite to what he knew relative to the ship Harmony."

"This counter declaration is not offered as a paper to which much confidence is due; but, suspicious as it is, it advised us to pause, before the Government was compromised upon Butler's single affidavit. I have therefore entertained the Executive of Virginia to remove all ambiguity. Mr. Bedinger has been aware of Butler's recantation: but as he had not seen it, the certificates which were forwarded from him by the Governor of that State, have, perhaps, been written before they will be carried."

"This is the sum of every syllable which we know concerning the Espérance, The train in which the subject now rests, is, in the opinion of the President, the most eligible one. The facts will be explored with all the expedition in my power."

"Fourth. You will correct me, sir, if I err when I suppose that you build your complaint of the repairs of the Theis upon the despatches from the Governor of Virginia, which I had the honor of enclosing to you on the 24th of February last. Being unapprized of any other statement, I shall direct my reply to that which is disclosed by those papers. The British Consul Hamilton, informed the collector at Norfolk, on the 2d of January, 1785, that the 'Theis and Cleopatra having received some damage, it would be necessary for them to have repairs, before they could again proceed to sea: that they were both expected there the first fair wind, for that purpose, and, be prepared to pass the forts in that harbor; both the collector thinking himself warranted to do any thing in the business, the lieutenant colonel of the militia of Norfolk was applied to, who directed his duty to give orders to the commandant of the forts, not to suffer the frigates to pass, until the Governor's orders should be had thereon.' The Executive of Virginia resolved that 'ships of war, circumstanced as those mentioned in the order, must be fitted to fit them for the coast, to declare that equipments in the ports of the United States, as vessels of war, in the immediate service of the Government of any nature, from being, if done to other vessels, would be of a doubtful nature, as being applicable either to commerce or war, are deemed lawful; except those which shall have been made prize of the subjects, people, or property of France, coming with the ports of the United States, pursuant to the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce with France.'"

"To the kind of repairs done to the Theis, I am, as yet, an absolute stranger. That they were not warlike, is rather probable from the expressions of the Virginia Executive. That they were not warlike, is more probable still, from their acquiescence. Every report accords with these conjectures. But, notwithstanding this strong appearance that the rules have not been violated, an inquiry has been instituted.

"Third. The third symptom of a British preudice is conceived to be, 'That the militia have, as yet, been assembled in sufficient numbers, and that their privative measures and concessions, are said to be dispositions and significations: either that they have not been designated by the standing instructions to the officers in the States, or that they have been proper to be employed in favor of the French on those conjunctures in which the militia would be the appropriate instruments, and of which there has been a sufficient time to employ them.

"Our constitutions, laws, and distribution into several independent States, naturally marked out the Governor, as the coadjutors of the Federal Government in maintaining our neutrality. Their quality of commanders-in-chief of the militia was particularly selected, when they were desired to co-operate, and the militia was pointed out as the reserve in case of emergency. If it has happened that, from negligence or design, France has been disappointed in succour from the militia when it ought to have been delivered, specify the instances, sir, they shall be immediately analyzed. In the mean time, permit me to observe, that it would have been not a little extraordinary to refuse the aid of the militia to one bellicose, to have been the only way to justify soverign demanding it, merely because the same of a like case had not occurred, and might not occur, in regard to another.

"Fourth. The predicament of a neutral nation is always peculiar and delicate; and enigmatically so, while it defends itself against a foreign power, and yet the misdoings of another. But you are not to infer from my justification of the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is attested. We did read, on the 10th of April, 1793, a publication from His Britannic Majesty's consul general for the Middle and Southern States of America, giving public notice that he had received official communications that the islands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, and Desodate, were, by proclamation, issued by His Britannic Majesty's general and vice admiral, commanding in the West Indies, declared to be in an actual state of blockade, and that neutral vessels were, by that proclamation, prohibited from attempting to enter any of the ports or places of the said islands, with provisions or supplies of any nature or kind whatsoever, under the penalty of being burnt or sunk, or otherwise disposed of without regard to human life. This directive has the West India commerce always been, that this exclusion was often revolved in the mind of the Executive. It was acknowledged that neutrals are interdicted by the law of nations from a blockaded port. From some quarter or other, the blockade must be notified; or else neutrals would be a constant, unsuspecting prey, not being in a condition to resist the interference. If, therefore, a vessel, which may be brought in, entered the port, but was not not the ued, but the besiegers, whether we consult, principle or practice. The check which neutrals have upon a wanton and false parade of a siege, is the same with the check upon any other groundless pretence. We might, indeed, throw in a few expletives in the form of a special art of precedents, but what can be predicated upon a document upon which the rescinding of that edict could have been urged. If rumor were a fit pronouice, who can pronounce on which side rumor preponderated, when stripped of the exaggerations which a host of passions had gathered together? We had, it may be said, one effect remaining, which was to promise to the citizens of the United States, that the proclamation was not to extend to their own citizens if we are, as much as at liberty to controvert the existence of the blockade, as we were when it was ushered into the world through the newspaper, if conveniences have arisen to the French republic by an interposition of our commerce with those islands, let them be accredited to the actual position of our affairs. It may, however, be remarked, that the Executive have not been unmindful of arrangements which might soften the severity of the laws of blockade.

Fifth, The first part of your fifth allegation, which implies that the United States quit the neutrality which they profess, by subscribing, through an excess of circumcision, (ménagement) to an order like the proclamation, has been just anticipated. To the second part, which asserts that we also quit the neutrality which we profess, by being unable to maintain our treaties, we answer that, although, to the best of our ability and understanding, we have maintained our treaties, yet, if any occasional or real inability has been shown, this cannot be transformed into a renunciation of neutrality.

To the third part, which implies the explained inabilities, we answer from an unfriendly nature that it has not been occasioned by the infancy and situation of our Government; that it could have been remedied by any expedition at our command, except our, reprisal, or the forerunners of both; and, not till then, will it be incumbent upon us so to account for it further. "That we have been obliged to abandon our relations exclusively to England," (as in the third place you have affirmed) is a question of fact between us. We despise the American, and we may not dispute the ocean; but American rights have not been relinquished. Of the time, mode, and style, of enforcing them, the United States are the sole judge.

Sixth. Throughout your letter, you have expressed allusions to the late treaty of the United States with Great Britain. We are for a special indulgence; and under such a cloak, frauds and impossibilities might be covered over. It is to be apprehended, that the executive arrangement of the Executive has not the solemn sense which might softened the severity of the laws of blockade.

The treaty has been communicated from the Department of State only to the chief magistrate of the Union. But it will not be conceived that reasons peculiar to the case caused this reserve, nor do we look forward nations which should lead us to infringe the usage of suspending the publication of treaties, until the ratifications have been exchanged, or to impart to them more than has been already imparted to the committee of public safety in France, by our envoy in London, through our minister in Paris. Yes, sir, you say that you demand justice only; justice you shall receive, but neither a country can in a manner of independence, if its moral existence is conditional, that the President himself to have often made you, that our treaties with France shall be sacred. No nation upon earth can control our will, unless preceding engagements be violated. To save the rights of the French republic was an ultimatum in the instructions to our envoy: the President has attended to these engagements. A Senate and a people shall decide. The President is willing to supercede any orders which can; he is expected from him, for the execution of our treaties with France, if any one shall be suggested from the prudence of the Executive. The President, it may be held against the Government, we shall meet at the proper season, and in the arm of political integrity. We confide that the wisdom and magnanimity of the French republic, which resisted past machinations to disturb our harmony, will receive, with caution, suspicions which may be hereafter thrown on our fidelity. For her happiness we pray, and may our connexion be perpetual.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 67.

Joseph Fauchet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9th Prairid. (June 8, 1795.),

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Your letter of the 29th of May was received by me on the 2d instant. The different subjects therein discussed merit the most serious consideration, I have taken some time to prepare an answer, which I shall now give with all the candor the subject requires. In the first place, I shall observe, sir, that, in writing my letter of the 2d of May, in consequence of a crowd of complaints which were brought to me, I had not proposed to myself a plan so extensive as that you have pursued in your despatch. It is observed that in order to give a notice for the conduct of the Executive in every circumstance there to the present condition of France, you have united, under a single view, my former and my present representations. I shall now communicate to you, freely, what the whole of your letter appears to me to enforce, and the reflections its object has otherwise suggested.

What is the nature of that situation which we are called on to consider?

the provisions of positive contracts, or the general laws of nations, France, being in a state of war, considers America as a neutral and an allied Power. In the first situation, she has rights common to all the belligerent Powers; in the second, she has particular rights which is entitled to consult, and which America has a right to demand. Without an explicit, but a right to certain privileges, have been neglected by a number of engagements, which is, in effect, and executed with indemnity; if, on the other, certain rights, common to all, are become doubtful as to us, by too much moderation in regard to the acts of other Powers; I would say, if your neutrality has been restrained by your own temporary, my complaints have been founded: for it is that to which they are made, and to which we alone, and still do I require it to be observed that I have hitherto avoided touching the latter point, and that latterly correspondence which, on both sides, could not but be painful. I wrote to you, in the first instance, on the useless vexations which the prizes of our privateers, sent into your ports, were permitted to suffer. These vexations have hitherto been continued under different pretences. The President once, in his address to our enemies for their intervention in prize causes, in truth frequently, and almost constantly, by using the double plea, of which you spoke to me; that is to say, by arguing either of seizure within the jurisdictional line of the United States, or of armament, or of augmentation of armament, of the capturing vessels, in their ports. On this subject, sir, you request me to specify to you a circumstance in which a prize was arrested, which did not come under that denomination, and you take the trouble to establish that they have a right to intervene in every case that can be brought under those heads. In the first place, sir, I never have, at least to my recollection, collected the right of your courts or of the Government to interfere in matters of the nature you mention. But I have complained of it in England, and those two or three cases that I have brought to your notice, I might, therefore, in answer to your request, cite to you a great number of affairs of the kind to which I allude, and you will be easy more at leisure to support them from the different consulats. I could, for example, bring on the tapis the affair of citizen Talbot, which is not yet determined, and in which your courts contest a prize, upon the validity of a commission for capturing the vessel. There is another case, as far as I can recollect, in nine cases, where the States have intervened. They support themselves in this circumstance with the treaty which the United States have with Holland, for that very treaty gives us the priviliges of the 17th article of ours; and I could cite, in proof of the facility with which they have been suffered, or we have been subjected to those vexations, and that one of the most unpleasant parts of my functions has been to answer the just claims of my injured countrymen. I could have wished that the Government had taken decisive measures, as well to prevent unjust chicaneries, as to maintain its regulations on the armaments, or augmentation of armaments, in the case of our nation. But, as far as I have been able to learn, the last, the General Government, had the power, of deciding cases of capture within the limits of the United States, and, in the interim, the contested prizes remained in the hands of the consuls. These regulations appear to have been commenced in the year of our treaty, in my opinion, by my predecessor on the 28th June, 1793. Measures for terminating the examinations in a summary manner, by voluntary arbitrations between the parties, after wards instituted, or by the cross-examination of contradictory witnesses, upon which the Government of the United States were to judge. These were communicated in November, 1793. It were to be wished that these proceed ings had been extended to the cases of prizes legally made by vessels duly commissioned, and contested at all hazards by our enemies before your tribunals. I have since proposed to you as an additional measure for expediting these affairs to subject the prorcers to furnish security for the damages occasioned by their suits. My proposal was not that of a decision in the present case, but of dispensing with the going over the papers that have beenarried to the courts, prefer the latter, in which they have the advantage of the process. Besides, I have succeeded in creating prosecutions which, at all events, believe we often even by obtaining decisions which encroach upon our treaties, since, according to your theory, the courts are uncontrollable in such matters. My proposal was, that they should be heard by the tribunals under the same simple question—is there ground for prosecution or not? And this method, in cases where there was absolutely ground for intervention on the part of the United States, would have been at once more natural and more conformable to our treaty. I should have preferred, which, by the way, the whole courts the right of taking cognizance, &c. You say that it is impossible that your courts should not grant protection to your citizens, and if you add, it is wished that the lives and property of our citizens should become the sport and prey of the first sea rover. There is no doubt on this head. But, if any fortuitous events of this nature have taken place, I should be the first to take notice of them. I do not defend prizes, and I see with regret that all the armed vessels of our nation which bring prizes into the United States suffer under such a bitter, and, I also add, such an ill-founded reflection. If sea rovers exist, who systematically attack the property of your fellow citizens, it is not certainly among the French mariners. I doubt whether you can reproach us of another case, similar to that in which the Concordo's seizure was made, with the right deduced from the principles of that decision. Nor have I ever heard of any satisfaction was never evinced in an equivocal manner; and I believe that, in many stronger cases than that, the United States have been far from obtaining from any other quarter so decisive and so sincere an act of justice. On touching upon the distinct heads of which I conceive it my duty so make to some parts of your letter, I, in two words, return to its commencement. You remind me of scenes long passed, the energetic measures of the war, the patience and generosity of the Government under those circumstances. I cannot believe that you wish to establish similitudes between the present and the past. Were I, for a moment, to admit it, I should remind you of the proclamation which I published on my arrival; and I should then content myself with requesting you to cite the cases in which I have authorized, in which I have permitted, contraventions of the laws of the United States, and of the regulations of the President, in the first instance, and afterwards of my engagements. Under the persuasion of the priors States by our privaters, since the present hostilities, have been brought into view, you would see the various cases in which, sometimes here, some time, sometimes both, have taken cognizance. You would doubtless be puzzled, amidst all these, to find the part of the 17th article of our treaty which specifies that we may bring our prizes into the ports of the United States, without the permission of your Government. You would find, in the first place, that I have become more pressing on the English than any other power to adhere to the terms of our convention, and in contempt of all neutrality, after having made French prizes, and pillaged your vessels under the single pretext of trading with France. Our Government have no doubt that all such shall be refused (except in cases of distress or of tempest) to the English vessels who shall have made prize of French vessels, or of French prizes. Under this persuasion I early complained against the admission of every English vessel of that denomina tion; it was this persuasion which induced me to write my letter of the 18th September, in answer to yours of the same month, in which I found a contracting of the treaty which to me appeared new. I admit, however, that you had notified me to, in your letter of 20th August, preceding, the regulations of the President of the United States establishing it; but I was so far from suspecting this article, that I did not, in reading it, observe it. These regulations a treaty of peace, which requires me to believe that they were never notif ied to me, I was surprised by your letter of the 20th August last. If no complaint has ever been made, all the subjects of it, especially is, that the English had not then a maritime force upon the coast, and that they had not dreamed (as we never thought ourselves that they had the right) of making use of your ports as a station, after having committed the acts for which the treaty pronounces against them a positive exclusion. Therefore, sir, the silence of the owners of ships with the United States cannot be argued on this subject. On analysing all my complaints upon this part of the treaty, they are reduced to the entry of English vessels which have made prizes the admission of these vessels with their prizes, or to the rejection of prizes which have not been made by the English. One part of what I have written is built, let it, according to construction, upon a false basis. But, even admitting that construction, the Terpsichore should not have been admitted at Norfolk, with the privateer la Montague, which, to say the least, she should not have been. You have, moreover, all the officers of my own letters, in which I have expressed my satisfaction. But, sir, if I could not but be satisfied, at that time, when the event developed the truth, shall find, reflect, I pray you, whether I have equally had reason to call the admission of vessels or of their admission of their prizes there. There never has been any hesitation in the point respecting the part of what I have written is built, I awa, according to your construction, upon a false basis. But, even admitting that construction, the Terpsichore should not have been admitted at Norfolk, with the privateer la Montague, which, to say the least, she should not have been. swerved, on the 19th of September, that he was going to make inquiry. It appears that the inquiry was not made, on the 29th of September, two other English frigates entered Hampton Roads, with two prizes made upon us, and the same day the vice consul sent a new complaint to the Executive of Virginia. The inquiries of Governor Lee could not have been very extensive, nor have been made in such haste, for it would seem, that if, on replying on the first day, the Virginia Government had been willing to give the vice consul the information desired; it could have been written at that time, and given them orders, we should not, at this moment, see the evil renewed, thirteen days after that reply. The vice consul received from the Lieutenant Governor an answer, dated the 9th of October. In this answer, the Lieutenant Governor pretends not to have read the second letter from the consul, of the 25th of September, and does not reply to it; he says he wrote one of the 29th of September, which neither the consul nor the commission of the Virginia Government, at that time, as you justly observe, that is to say, twenty-five days after her entering into your ports with a French prize.

You have here, sir, where I find reasons to support a predilection for England. I shall answer you with the same spirit as I have done in the other case. Let me interrogate you. I observe that our consuls are abused by specious correspondences, merely to cover inactivity; that our enemies are permitted to do what they please, from the want of precise instructions to the commanders, which should authorize them to act immediately on such contraventions of the treaty taking place. It is quite as important to have the provisions of the treaty readily administered as it is to have crimes committed against it; it is quite as important to have the consequences of their commission immediately applied to the persons offending as to have the suffering of the consular officers of account, and seen in the public line; and if it could be had, I would request it to be the law, and not the practice, to give the consular officers select cases only, or to make them in a manner, inoperative. I request you will immediately have them seized by your militia."

On the 5th of December following, he gave additional orders for having seized, in like manner, the prizes alleged to have been made within the jurisdictional line of the United States, by British officers. But it is in vain to argue the question with you. I have not so much as the proof of his activity in doing justice to my complaints, and I do sincerely believe that our consular officers are often brought to the task of consoling the consuls residing there, and without observing the most common respect due to a public vessel by the law of nations, and stipulated for ours by treaty. I might cite the vigor with which a vessel going to Guadaloupe, and suspected, indeed, of an infringement of the rules of your neutrality, had been arrested at Norfolk. I leave it to impartial men to compare this energetic conduct with the orders lately given against the English vessels which refused to respect your neutrality, and the alteration of those public orders almost immediately after they were issued.

As to the affair of the corvette Esperance, it was vain to support the conduct, in that respect, with what the consuls could have written on the subject; for the Argus, which took her, should not have been permitted to enter more readily than herself, and she, having been partially equipped in your waters, should have been proscribed. I shall not take the trouble to examine the deposition of Butler, the pilot, and his retraction. To judge of the merit of the case by the little information I have, I must know that there is no such a thing as pro et con, and in which officious persons may have informed Butler that he had been imposed on, or mistaken.

After having reviewed the different particular cases upon which I have complained, permit me to give an opinion which has weight with me, which is, that it is impossible for me, among the constructions given to that part of the treaty, to discover the intention of the two contracting parties. By the treaty of alliance, France relinquished her former neighboring possessions to the northward of the United States, in which she had ports of great convenience during her wars. By the treaty of anuity and commerce, signed the same day, she conceived that she assured herself some advantages, as an indemnification, in the ports of the United States themselves, of which she had, in part, foregone the use and privileges. The treaty of commerce gives this right, and does not make a thing authorized, if the prizes coming with the vessels of war were to be only those coming with their prizes; it says, that asylum shall not be given to any vessel having made prizes. Permit me, sir, to say, that this is not a construction, but an addition, which you give to the treaty, which are different things. The is not a construction; it is an addition, it were sufficient, when I complained of the repairs made to the Theis, to reply that she had a right to them.

From these forced constructions it results that the belligerent Powers raise pretensions which were not looked for, and acknowledge themselves that the meaning of our treaties appears to them obscure. The correspondence which took place wrote to the effect below, with the minister of France on a point very important to consult our officers, of which you are the head.

Have you not yourself been struck with this avowal of Mr. Hammond, that the treaty specifies only the conduct to be observed towards the capturings vessels, and nothing of the prizes? What trouble had you in urging your construction when you answered that article, and you did not interpret the article so literally as to place the whole of the ship, with her prizes, under your jurisdiction. I am not surprised at that refusal that it is an asylum to curtailing vessels only: for it excludes every vessel which shall have made prizes on the French?" Without doubt, sir, that is the true construction; every thing becomes clear when that is maintained: the capturing vessel as well as her prize are not admitted into your ports.

I shall have occasion hereafter to present the difference of a Power and the government to which he is sent is not by any means conclusive. I adhere, with all my heart, with you, to the principles contained in the part of Mr. Jefferson's letter which you cite; but I observe that there is no reason to make me the reproach you seem to insinuate upon my mistaken opinion; and present it to you, under the circumstances of the case, to know if you do not inform me that the President cannot admit my vessel, and that I am sent by such an, so I should content myself with referring them to the French Government.

I have gone over in detail the different points stated in our correspondence: let us return to that part of your letter which considers the neutrality of the United States.

I conceived, sir, that the respect and circumspection with which I had touched on this question would have spared me the bitter reflections which your letter appears to contain on that matter. However great may be my desire to enter into details for my own defence, yet I shall waive them, from the same motives which dictated my first letter. I could have been willing to have been convinced of having been wrong; but I have been unwilling to seem willing to leave over the measures of the English, and refute the application of the ground upon which you give the ground of the Executive of the Government of the United States for the subject of these measures. I might make it difficult for you to prove to me, that the English Government under the treaty of commerce and navigation with the United States, and the natural con- structions with which neutral commerce is assailed in all cases. I might, in like manner, hesitate to admit that the Federal Government had not sufficient grounds to demand their revocation. But that would lead, against my incli- nation, into an examination of the cases in which a neutral Power should actually acknowledge an infringement of the place it should also be obligied to ex- aminie whether the principles with which the English Government endeavor to support itself are consecrated by the law of nations, or whether they are not rather established to serve on the present occasion whether, in changing the language, the cabinet of London has changed its measures whether the successive orders of the 5th June and 6th November, 1793, and of the 8th January, 1794, are not variations of the same system, to which the depre

It is not less indignant than France, against whom they are specially directed. The history of your neutrality, in my opinion, proves my assertion, that it has been a prey to the arbitrary conduct of Great Britain, and would have served as a justification of what I might and should represent on the subject.

In fact, from the evidently precarious situation of the neutrality of America, and from the vexations to which she is subjected, could I not show that this neutrality is in a violent situation, to which the United States cannot adjust themselves in proportion to the extent of their territory, and to the course of their action, and of a solemn reparation, which, by giving to America what her honor requires, would have manifested towards the French republic the inclination and intentions of your Government? I would have remarked that these reparations are not, but that, if, in my previous report, they appeared as

From this contradiction between the promises and the performance of them, the consequences seem to have arisen—that the United States had not yet established their neutrality upon as respectable a footing as France desired, and had instructed me to demand. I was going to conclude that your Government had not done, in this respect, what it had engaged to do. I have not, however, theauxiliary power should arise from the awkwardness towards the ancient ally, who has not ceased, on the contrary, to testify thistso much she desired to see the bands which connect the two countries, brought closer together. This idea suggests to me a reflection that the friendship professed by the United States towards our republic, and of which they have, on several occasions, repeated assurances, does not permit them to alter their situation towards our most mortal enemies, to our disadvantage, and amidst hostilities, the origin of which undoubtedly take date from the independence of America.

These remarks, which I have long resolved in my mind, led me, sir, accidentally, to speak to you of the treaty, in my letter of the 3d of May, but, feeling all the circumstances which the silence observed on that act prescribed, I only presented doubts to you, and did not even imagine that the manner in which I wrote to you would have given rise to a controversy between us. Besides, sir, it would be superfluous for me at present to commence such a subject with you. I therefore close by appealing specially to the attention of the Federal Government upon points of a diplomatic and sentimental kind. I wish for the access of the President of the United States, and the support of their neutrality upon a respectable footing towards and against all. I conceive it my duty to point out a thing as infinitely desirable, which is, that nothing definitively be concluded as to the treaty submitted for the ratification of the Senate, until my successor, who is momentarily expected, shall have communicated the sentiments which, as you have received upon that important subject, I conjure you, sir, to submit this reflection immediately to the President.

I have but one word more to say, sir, on the close of your letter, in which you recur to contrasts between the perpetually alternating world. I have had much the same impression as you. I think the idea of endeavoring to injure the harmony existing between the two nations. I do not think that any one has ever given greater evidence than myself of a sincere desire of uniting. It still less can I admit, notwithstanding some of your expressions, that your object was to inspire me with fear as to the manner in which I have conformed as ever. I am persuaded, on the contrary, that a true friend, who, from any personal considerations whatever, should comport with his duty, would be unworthy the confidence of his country.

Accept, sir, &c.

No. 68.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fauchet,* Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 13, 1795.

SIR:

have not been able to acknowledge sooner your letter of the 8th instant, which I had the honor of receiving on the same day.

If the plan pursued in mine of the 29th ultimo be more extensive than the one proposed in yours of the 2d, you will ascribe the enlargement of it to my solicitude to remove every dissatisfaction felt by the minister of our ally. A part, however, of that plan being, to collect, with fidelity, the facts applicable to your various charges, and to com ment on them, I am now replying to the point with which you are pleased to meet me. But I must be pardoned, if I pass over, without much stress, any general declarations, which are not susceptible of a precise argument: for, how shall we defend our Government against undelicted insinuations like these? That positive engagements, which give France a right to certain expectations, are not confirmed by the facts; that different rights, common to all, have become doubtful, for you, by too much submission to the acts of other Powers; that you could cite a great number of examples; that it will be easy, more at leisure, to have a collection made of them in the different consulates; that almost all the prizes have been subject to arbitrage; that one of the most misgrievous parts of your functions has been to reply to the just complaints of your injured fellowcitizens. &c.

Let me, therefore, recur to your instances of our delinquency. These are: 1st. That the courts of admiralty have always yielded to the importance of your enemies, for an interference with your prizes. 2d. That, in the affair of citizen Talbot, which is not yet terminated, our tribunals have contested a French prize, upon a question of the validity of a commission, delivered by a governor of Guadaloupe, which falls within neither of my two principles. 3d. That the privateer le Citoyen de Marseilles, armed and commissioned at the Cape, having arrived in the respect, everything in its proper time, and having again gone out. 4th. That the ships of war of Charleston, the former of which were sold without opposition, and the latter have been seized, and adjudged illegal. 5th. That Government did not adopt as decisive measures for preventing the unjust chicaneries practised upon French prizes, as for maintaining its own rules respecting armaments, and the augmentation of force within the United States. 6th. That there was a tardiness as to the Terpiche, which we ought not to have been admitted into our ports, with her prize, the Montagne, nor the Argounat, with her prize, l'Esperance, which was equipped there. 6th. That armed men were sent on board of the French ship Favorite, at New York, to search her, (l'Esperance in her) which incites there, and having again gone out. 7th, and lastly. That the violence under which our neutrality labors required an energetic, vigorous re-action, and a solemn reparation, which, by giving to the United States all that their honor demanded, would have manifested to the French nation, consistently and uniformly, the existence of an energetic and vigorous conduct towards our ancient ally; and that our situation ought not to be changed towards your mortal enemies to your disadvantage, and in the midst of hostilities, the origin of which is, undoubtedly, in the independence of America.

I add that the impressions which the impression has always yielded to the importance of your enemies, is afterwards diminished or increased, for "cédile" with which they deem your prizes untenable. Is the denunciation aimed at their head or their heart? You admit the "right of our tribunals, or of our Government, to interpose" in captures within our jurisdictional line, or which have been made by its vessels, in our presence, for example, they certainly may be exercised, and they mayered; but this no man can pronounce positively, until every circumstance shall be laid before him; and I again pledge myself to discuss the cases, when you shall enable me, by naming them, to institute the proper inquiries. What, if they have erred? When a party thinks himself aggrieved by the sentence of an inferior court, he has a right of appeal to the courts of record, and if it be so, it is by paper. It is the business of the courts to decide the sentence by the parties themselves, and conclusive. If an appeal be admitted, and the judges, in the last resort, give sentence according to their conscience, though it should be erroneous, yet, as, "in doubtful questions, different men think and judge differently, all that a friend can desire, is, that justice should be impartially administered to all the people in the same country."

A defect of integrity in our judges will not be vindicated, when it shall be once ascertained; and if such a blot defiles the records of the American forum, by detecting it, you will deserve the tribute of being instrumental to the satisfaction of the community. It is not a matter to be lightly or possibly, by the possibility of this disgrace, and disbelieve that political predilections have ever transpired in any of their decrees.

Second. The district court of South Carolina, and the circuit court held for the United States in that state, have both condemned Talbot's prize. But she was condemned, not because the commission, delivered by the Governor of South Carolina, provided for the case, but because, as the vessel was 'steered in an American port,' proceeded thence to Gaudaloupe for the express purpose of changing the property, and applying for a commission, obtained the commission within the two days after the sale of the vessel, and under color of that commission, was returned to South Carolina. Thus, the vessel, after the sale of which, it was known in an American port, armed in an American port, for the express purpose of cruising under it, was only repelled. It is true that a final decision has not yet taken place; the reason of which is, that the captors, having already been defeated in two courts, are resolved to try the chance of the supreme court of the United States. Not having been informed from a respectable quarter, that, notwithstanding the apparent sale of the vessel, the prizes which should be made by her were, principally, if not altogether, to be the property of the American citizens who were her owners when she sailed for Gaudaloupe.

Third. That a difference of opinion has prevailed at New York and Charleston, as to the prizes of the Citoyen de Marseilles, is at least an evidence that the interruption of their sale was not the consequence of a governmental concern. It may be easily accounted for by supposing, as the truth is, that the culpability of that privateer was unknown at New York, and that a law has been passed at Charleston.

Mr. Dallas, the Secretary of Pennsylvania, wrote on the 24th January, 1794, in the name of the Governor of that State, to the Secretary of War, requesting to be informed whether the opening of fire ports on each side of that vessel, for the mounting of guns, could be deemed an augmentation of her military equipments. The next day the Secretary of War transmitted a letter to the Secretary of Pennsylvania, which has a letter from the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, dated the 24th instant, in which it is stated, that an application has been made to open five ports on each side of the French vessel called the Citizen de Marseilles, at the instance of the President of the United States. It would be prejudicial to the interest and safety of the President and the United States, as well as to the executive functions of the President, in the circumstances of the case, the proposed alteration could be deemed an augmentation of her military equipments.

This letter, sir, is, has been submitted to the President of the United States, who has directed me to inform you that the said port holes being closed previously to the arrival of the said vessel in this port, that the opening of them, in order to mount cannon therein, would, in my judgment, be, as much an augmentation of the force of the said vessel, as if the port holes were now to be cut for the first time, and that the measure, therefore, is, to be prevented.

It is to be remembered, that the same principle operated in the decision of the President, in July last, relatively to the British letter of marque ship Jane, whose force was reduced to the same situation it was at the time of her arrival, by closing her new port holes, disinmounting the additional cannon, and destroying, or reluding, her new gun carriages, before she was permitted to leave the port.

There is, at present, a prohibition of the officers of the customs, uninfluenced by the rage which has been ascribed to them against French cruisers, reported in her favor. How greatly, therefore, it must astonish you to learn, as has been represented to me, that, after these visits, she took in several guns in the river Delaware; that this has appeared to the satisfaction of a distress warrant, and that a writ of error is to be made in this circuit court? The arrest, therefore, to the force of her prizes, comes within your own acknowledgment, that the tribunals of the United States "have a right to interfere, in cases of an augmentation of the armament of capturing vessels in our ports."

Fourth. The measures, chosen at first by the Government for enforcing its rules, were, through the agency of its officers, the revenue officers of the United States. Their impartiality will be shown in the suppression of British as well as French armaments in our ports; and in your wish that they had continued to be used, as they were in the year 1793, in relation to the prizes which were questioned.

Mr. Dallas, sir, that, although the Executive was at first competent in authority to retain under his special direction prizes, made by vessels which had been equipped in derogation of our sovereignty, it would have been more expedient to refer them to the courts. Until the law of fifth June, 1794, their jurisdiction could not have been said to be established. Being conferred by law, the President could not withdraw it, Or, if he could, it would have been improper to do so, without a confidence in their virtue, wisdom, firmness, and disinterestedness; men, approved by the Senate from the same confidence; men, whose forms and habits peculiarly qualify them for nice examinations of evidence and law; men who judge not, in your phrase, according to "lazsce," but upon facts which may or may not be as maliciously mistaken. Hence the temporary and great measure, to be considered as an "ancient regulation fallen into disuse."

As to the bond which you will, undoubtedly, present in your letter of the 29th of October, 1794, has told you that the Executive considers the whole inquiry of the Executive and the Judicial courts, in cases where it becomes necessary to take a vessel, as an extreme measure, not to take it as a matter of course, and, the Executive magistrate, as the military authority, to offer to interfere in any case wherein they should undertake to act. My letter of June 29th, accordingly, in the same case, the ship William, informed you, that no permission was given to take a vessel in the court of admiralty in the case of that ship, and that the Executive magistrate, not to take cognizance of that case, that it resulted to the Executive to interfere in it. Consequently, this alone put in their power to leave the vessel in the hands of the consuls. The courts of justice exercise the sovereignty of this country in judiciary matters, are subject in these, and liable neither to control nor opposition from any other branch of the Government." Hence the temporary and great measure, to be considered as an "ancient regulation fallen into disuse."

when you suppose that "all the armed vessels of your nation, which have brought prizes into the United States," are viewed by me as pirates; very far was this aspersions from my intention. Be pleased to revise my expression. If you shall be satisfied that, from haste or other cause, you have misunderstood me, you will cancel the impression which you may have received of my mind, and your misunderstanding may be said to be the only short the debate by disavowing any such sentiment. I meant to stigmatize those French cruisers only who captured the property of others, or of other people not associated in the war.

Fifth. Although it may be seriously apprehended that a diplomatic intercourse, which shall be occupied in calculating the influence of the vessels that entered the ports of the United States, may be so far the more delicate than I could have imagined, yet I will once more run over the minutes of the Terpsichore, and of her prize la Montagne and of l'Esperance.

The first circumstances of official sloth, which has been attributed to the Governor of Virginia, is his omission to answer the vice consular letter of the 31st August, 1793, until I forwarded the same to M. de l'Esperance, who was dispatched by the order of government, how it was addressed, so as to be comprehended by any other person, in case of the Governor's absence, appears to me. Nor is it material; for, by accident, not by design, the Governor was not on the spot when it reached Richmond.

In the meantime, however, it is, that, on the 25th of September, two other English frigates entered Hampton with two French prizes; and the same day the vice consul sent a new complaint to the Executive of Virginia. You have yourself furnished good grounds to suspect that this letter never attained its destination.

However, sir, if you add this to be important, I request you to specify the names of those frigates, and every other detail, which may include the case, that I may be prepared.

Thirdly. You insist that the Governor ought, on the 12th of September, to have given orders to the officers whom it concerned. It is not improbable that the very apology which you offer, for the silence of the agents of France, of one of the most important rules of 1793, may have prevented the subject from the Executive of the United States, at that instant, "that the English had not before had a maritime force upon our coast." Perhaps it might have been considered, as requiring no small share of circumspection to drive from our rivers the public ships of a foreign nation. Had the Governor of Virginia been situated as some other Governors are, he might have issued an order for the departure of the capturing vessel immediately on her arrival. As it was, he might well have been backward until he should have been driven by necessity to depurate others upon such an occasion. But be this as it may, the circular letter from this Department, on the 10th of October, 1794, is demonstrative of the sincerity of the Executive, in providing for the emergency, as others do. We did not then again demand an additional answer in trailing the consuls on, as you represent, by ostensible correspondences which cover nothing but inertness (lenteurs) nor yet in the want of satisfactory instructions; which were not delayed more than twenty-eight days upon an extreme computation, and much less upon an accurate one; and which must have been few, very few indeed; and only I believe in one State, whose Executive resides at a distance from the seaboard.

Fourthly. The Governor's letters, on the 22d August, and 5th of December, 1793, to the commanders of countries, are exhibited as a mark of rancour against the French republic. You arraign that of August 22d, "because, in giving to the squadron which had made the Inhabitants of the United States, he says what did not apply to any but French vessels." Consult his own language. "It having been decided by the President of the United States that no armed vessel which has been, or shall be, originally entered in any part of the United States, as a prize or prize, by either of the parties at war, to have asylum in any of the ports of the United States, in case any vessel, within the foregoing description, should arrive in any port or harbor, within the limits of your county, you are to cause her to be ordered to depart immediately, and in case of her refusal, you are to take effectual measures to oblige her to depart. Force is not to be resorted to, unless you shall be prepared to procure the service of the vessels, and in the discretion of the vessel or vessels shall have been sent or brought, subsequent to the fifth instance, or should hereafter send or bring, any prize or prizes into any port or harbor within your county, you will cause such prize or prizes to be immediately secured by your militia, for the purpose of transmitting the former to the State or States of the United States, and all the belligerent parties, and a letter from this Department to Mr. Geo. Washington, 23d of June, 1792, shows that it had operated equally upon English prizes, if it had not been for the exclusion stipulated by treaty in favor of all prizes but those of the French. Were the treaty out of the way, so that prizes, made by the English, might enter our harbors, the Governor's order would involve them in its scope, and would arrest them also, if captured by an illicit privateer.

The letter of the 5th of December orders the commandant that, "in case they should take possession of any vessel upon an alleged seizure or an alleged seizure of her having been captured within three miles and a half of our seaports, rivers or bays, they will be pleased to certify to the same to the Governor, that he may direct the manner in which the witnesses shall be examined." You have interpreted this letter into "an additional order to cause to be seized the prize, and which is not that desired. This order does not require that the officers shall seize upon any allegation, but delineates a particular step in case they should seize; when to seize upon an allegation, was an affair of discretion with them. That discretion, like the discretion of every public officer, was to be regulated by a reasonable degree of evidence. Truly, sir, I should concept your own knowledge, that it would be impossible to you by the execution of this rule, which so much may be requisite for yourselves. It is enough to ask, if it be possible that the Governor of a State, designated to preserve our neutrality, would ever suffer vessels to be torn from the French cruisers, upon the naked declaration of a British proprietor that they were not within our jurisdiction? Has it ever been done? Your answers and mine cannot, I am persuaded, be widely variant from each other.

The observations which you have been pleased to communicate to me, on the subject of l'Esperance, have not shed those lights which I wished. Perhaps I was entitled to expect a more ample elucidation; since you persist in your answers, and since the evasive expressions of the French vice consul, and the equivocal footing of Butler's affidavit, utterly deprive us of the means of information. Mr. Hammond has indeed forwarded me a letter from Admiral Murray, an extract of which refers to the capture of this corvette. "The French squadron of war l'Esperance, was brought into Lynhaven Bay, on the 11th January, a few days after my arrival; the merchantmen leagues had been entered a month before; there were five frigates, a lieutenant, with a sufficient number of men only to navigate her, (not being half the complement the French had in her) were sent on board from the Resolution and Argonant, and so soon as the weather permitted those ships to approach her with water and provisions, I sent her to sea, that I might give no umbrage to the American States. An additional reason for bringing l'Esperance into Lynhaven Bay, was out of humanity to the French prisoners, whom, having had a long voyage, I sent to Norfolk, as soon as prudence would admit; otherwise they must have been kept prisoners on board the whole winter, and sent to Halifax in the spring; nor was she equipped or armed for defence, as no one could man her without the assistance of the Americans, and when at sea only an acting order to command her, which is customary and absolutely necessary in all captures, otherwise, if retaken by the enemy, he might be considered as a pirate." Mr. Murray's letter recommends, at least, that a full inquiry be made and without your aid, I do not as yet discover any certain resort for an explanation of this affair.

Sixth. You remonstrated, on the 23rd of September, 1794, on the search and treatment of the Favorite, and on the 25th I wrote to you the following letter: "I regret extremely that any citizen of the United States, and more especially a seaman, should be insulted to a public officer, and that public officer, the most amiable of men, having been innocently written to the attorney of the district of New York, to inquire into and report the facts, as you will perceive from the enclosed copy. The course might have been shortened by directing to proceed in the case as the law directs. But this has not been adopted, because we wish to reserve to ourselves the decision in this particular as it is suggested that a public officer is concerned, and we take an interest in causing justice to be done to the Republic, as far as possible, under our own eye." On the 23d of October, the day after I had received the documents from the district attorney of New York; I enclosed them to you; and on the 17th of November, 1784, this business was concluded. I imagined, in the following letter to you: "The Executive of the United States being obliged to collect information of facts, at a distance, through the public officers, and having a confidence in them, it was conceived sufficient, in the first instance, merely to transmit to you the evidence which had been obtained respecting the Favorite. Hence, in the letter which I had the honor of writing to you, I had the reflection respecting the envelopes retaining any reflections until it should be ascertainment, upon your part, whether the allegations were true. "The opinion which the President has formed relieves both you and myself of no small difficulty in comparing and accounting for the fastening." He had thought proper to instruct me to inform you that, on the faith which he always repose in your assertions, he takes these points for granted; that the Favorite is a public vessel of war, bearing the commission of the French republic; and that no contravention of the act prohibiting the exportation of military stores was meditated, in the vessel which you have informed me about. "The President highly disapproves, that a public vessel of war, belonging to a foreign nation, should be searched by the officers of the customs, upon a suspicion of illicit commerce. The propriety of representing such a suspicion to the consul of that nation, or the commissioner of the customs, is a necessity, in order to reserve the right. General Washington will be therefore given to pursue this course, with the view that, if it should be ineffectual, the Government of the United States may adopt those measures which the necessity of the case and their rights may require. "An article of construction, founded on the same principles, will be also forwarded to the collector of New York; with this addition, to discontinue the prosecution against the public, and restore what may be within his power or command. At the same time, I must repeat the assurance which we entertain, that you will prevent the stores from being used in any manner contrary to the act before referred to. "I flatter myself, sir, that this separation of what is past, and the precaution against the future, will manifest such a disposition in our Government as will induce you to approve the decision which a sense of justice imposes upon the President, to waive any further measures: for the appearance and circumstances of the Favorite might have been made sufficient just ground for apprehension. With this situation, to the consideration that, in our new situation, it cannot be expected that all our officers should meet every occurrence with a correct knowledge of the usages of nations. "An insult to the French flag will not be tolerated by the President, whatsoever he can prevent or punish it. But his concern is only to satisfy himself that there is no difficulty to clear a vessel for the coast of Virginia. It is the President's purpose, therefore, to cause the officers of the customs to be admonished to respect your flag: and if this be not satisfactory, and you are still persuaded that an insult has been committed, I shall be ready to concur in any arrangement which may be convenient, for the full examination of such other witnesses as may be necessary." Being unable to add any other vindication in regard to the Favorite, and not being informed of the vessel going to Guadaloupe, and said to have been arrested at Norfolk, on suspicion of infringing our neutrality, nor yet how it appeared to him, I wrote to the president of the judicial board: "It may be in any predicament whatever, the countermanding of the orders given by the Governor of Virginia to the militia officers of Norfolk, to refuse comfort to British vessels, using our waters as a station, cannot be tortured into any connection with her. For the act of the President never authorized the State Executives to issue such an order; no other Executive would misunderstand it. The vessel of which I have spoke, was seized and burnt by the Federal Executive; and you may determine, from my correspondence with Mr. Hammond on this subject, what the President finally contemplated. "Upon this a few words will be sufficient. Of the reaction towards Great Britain, and of the repARATION to war-like courses, the United States are the only legitimate judges. They will adapt the one and the other to their estimate of their own power and interest. Being the defenders of their own honor and welfare, they will not be suspected of voluntarily abandoning either; and if they do not mount to the pitch which the French republic would produce, their good will and intentions towards you, that you call, sir, lukewarm or to our ancient ally, is an upright neutrality. The new arrangements against which you have expressed yourself, are a part of the great subject which is now at the disposal of the Senate. "There are some miscellaneous matters, which remain to be touched briefly. We have, in the construction of this article of the treaty, explanations between the two Governments. But, in the mean time, I must own that I do not feel the importance of Mr. Hammond's acknowledgment to your reasoning. He had contended that, under our treaty with France, we could not expel the prices made by the British cruisers, upon our national principles. I informed them of our own conduct, and of the measures which we had adopted respecting the cruisers themselves, and which, by his literal exposition, would be defeated. You do not seem to be aware of the dilemma to which this mode of reasoning exposes you. If Mr. Hammond be correct, then are your complaints against the admission of prizes, and our anxiety to prevent it, wholly unfounded: and if Mr. Hammond be wrong, with which I will not be indulged, he is surely is of no avail whether a British minister reasons well or ill though I do not recollect that he has repeated this branch of his position since he has been apprised of its tendency. Wheresoever truth lies, it is our duty to follow; and I rest our construction upon this frank principle; that, notwithstanding the letter of the treaty, its spirit, its context, and the rules of interpretation, will uphold the regulations of our Government. "In a procedure like this, it will not be easy to find a leaning or subserviency to Great Britain. It is a leaning and subserviency to the character of our nation. Your letter strongly demonstrates the propriety of my remark, that a neutral nation, while it defends itself against charges from one of the warring Powers, may seem to palliate the misdoings of another. But we surely ought to have been exempt from this reflection; as you are particularly desired not to infer, from my justification of the Executive, that the validity of the proclamation of blockade is as asserted by you, as admitted; that we are indignant at which Great Britain has done up; and as we have employed and still do employ means which is not within national law for us, to permit yourself to be more specific in your accusations we cannot surrender the consciousness of our political purity. "It is with real regret that I read in your last letter an idea, that we have not done justice to your proclamation, to your displeasure at the crew of the Constitution, and to your general conduct towards and Government of England. I cannot reconcile these with my expression of respect for your conduct as a master of such a vessel of commerce as he is, or to deny you, by personal considerations, from the discharge of your duty. A respect to ourselves would forbid such an attempt; a respect for you would forbid it. Having no possible object, distinct from the interest of the United States, we are incapable of its being confirmed in our power to evince any enmity. We are trusted in your breast so unworthy a motive. As you again disdain an approbation of Mr. Genet's excesses, so am I not scrupulous to confess that I should not have recurred to them, had not inferred from your letter an inclination to bring them up with some share of countenance to them. But this being, as you inform me, the unspoken fear, which is natural in a guilty nature, I should have been stated to you more formally and minutely—the citizens of the United States have a right, and will exercise the right, freely to investigate the measures of Government. "I have it in my power to say to the Executive to whom he is accredited, upon any of those measures affecting his country. But it will ever be denied as a right of a foreign minister, that he should endeavor, by an address to the people, oral or written, to forestall a depending measure, or to defeat one which has been decided, by a precedent which has been declared. This remark is made more, because it cannot be erroneously wrested into a defense or outwork of the treaty with Great Britain and because it is an assertion of the sovereignty of the United States, consistent with what is past, and we trust not likely to be contradicted hereafter. "I cannot conclude this letter without offering to you my sincere wishes for your happiness, and a personal assurance of the great respect and esteem, with which I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.
Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Harrison, District Attorney of New York.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 30, 1795.

Sir: I must beg the favor of you to inform me for what cause a libel has been filed against the French privateer La Vengeance, and her Spanish prize. As many particulars as you can conveniently give me will be acceptable, Mr. Adet being very urgent in his complaint of the arrest. I will thank you to add, what previous examination, or rather what degree of evidence, usually precedes an order for arresting vessels in the situation of the foregoing. You answer by the earliest moment will greatly oblige me. I have the honor to be, &c. EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 70.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 15th Thermidor, (August 2, 1795.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Among other documents which I have received from citizen Berard, captain of the privateer La Vengeance, and all of which incontestably prove that his vessel was not armed on this continent, there is one, of which I send you a copy.

This is a copy of the information of the district attorney of New York, upon which the seizure of the ship La Vengeance was grounded, accompanied by a certificate of the clerk of the court, who attests that no affidavit, no proof, was produced in support of this information.

Since I had the honor to write to you on this affair, an offer has been made to Captain Berard to release his vessel upon giving security. He refused; and persists in claiming the removal of the seizure without any condition, and with a reservation of his right to damages and interest. Justice supports his claim. In fact, what signifies security? Will it alone for the infraction of treaties, if it is proved by the decree that the privateer was armed on the continent?

I repeat the request, which I have already made to you, to remove the seizure which has been made of citizen Berard’s vessel. Permit me to remark to you, that a longer detention will considerably increase the indemnity he claims; and it will occasion unnecessary expense when a decree shall be pronounced on the merits of the business.

The vouchers which have been communicated to me established the fact in so clear a manner, that I have not the least doubt as to the issue of the suit instituted between the captor and the prizes, notwithstanding the employment, in the defence of this bad cause, of the English expedient—subornation.

I have in my hands a convincing proof of this last fact.

Accept, sir, &c. P. A. ADET.

Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. ADET, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 11, 1795.

Sir: Since my last letter to you respecting the privateer La Vengeance and her prize, the enclosed papers have been transcribed, and I await myself of the earliest moment to forward them.

I have the honor to be, &c. EDM. RANDOLPH.
In the absence of Mr. Harrison, who is attending our supreme court at Albany, Mr. Ludlow has put into my hands your letter of the 30th ult., to Mr. Harrison, on the subject of the suits depending against the French privateer La Vengeance, and her Spanish prize.

The suit was filed in the admiralty court of the district of New York, for the United States, in behalf of Don Diego Pintado, a subject of the King of Spain, against the ship San Joseph, alias La Princesa de Asturias, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances, and the cargo on board of her. A copy of the libel is enclosed. On the filing of the libel, the usual process was issued to the marshal, in virtue of which he took the ship and served the process. Arrear of the 13th instant, the French privateer La Vengeance, filed his answer and claim in suit so instituted in behalf of Don Diego Pintado, a copy of which answer and claim is also enclosed. The suit was instituted upon the official application of the Spanish consul for the United States, and was commenced from the information of a number of the revenue officers in the port of Philadelphia, and also between one of these officers and the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania. From these letters, and other information received by the Spanish consul, there was strong reason to apprehend that the French privateer had been fitted out and armed within the United States, and that the property was the subject of the suit would be against the libellant. For the payment of these costs and damages, security to the satisfaction of the claimant has been taken. The suit has been at issue for some days past, and divers witnesses have been examined on both sides. On the part of the libellant it has been testified in substance, that the privateer in question is a very fast ship, armed for trading and for war, that she was put on board a Spanish vessel, that the property in question was reduced to the port of Philadelphia, and that the privateer being in the port of Philadelphia in the month of March last, (under the character of a merchantman) appearances manifested an intention of fittting her out as a privateer. These appearances were communicated to the revenue officers, who caused her to be seen and shut; that the privateer had been opened, and hinged put on them; that irons were fixed on her bow for swivels; that she had a great number of water casks in her hold, and a very large coabose on board of her; that the water casks were too numerous, and the coabose too large, for the accommodation of such a vessel on a common trading voyage; that the privateer brought in the character of a captain from a vessel to the United States; that her military equipments were reduced by the interference of the Government; that the said coabose remained on board, and was alleged by the captain to be intended for the accommodation of a number of passengers; that on or about the twenty-third day of March last past, the privateer, so as aforesaid reduced as to her military equipments, sailed from the port of Philadelphia, and at the distance of about thirty or forty miles below her port with a shallop lying at anchor, and waiting for her; that thereupon the privateer came to, and two cannon, being three pounders, two swivels, some muskets, pistols, sabres, pikes, and some bullets (rather of a larger caliber than the cannon) were taken from the shallop and put on board her; that after these equipments being transported directly to New York, and anchored within the Hook, about the distance of two musket shots from the Hook, the day before Easter; that soon after her said arrival at the Hook, she was visited by Captain Dennis, of the revenue cutter, who asked what vessel she was, and from whence she had come. The answer, received through one Wilson, was, that she had come from Guadaloupe. Upon which Captain Dennis further asked, what passage she had had. The reply was, fifteen or sixteen days. Captain Dennis then repeatedly desired to see the papers of the privateer, but they were constantly refused, upon the pretext that the privateer was upon a secret mission, which could be communicated only to the French consul; that upon this the pilot who had brought the privateer from below the fort above mentioned, had been commanded by the privateer to open the port of Philadelphia, and to open the Hook only for shelter, and that she wanted nothing; that Captain Dennis hereupon offered the captain of the privateer a passage in the revenue cutter to the city of New York, which was refused; that thereupon Captain Dennis left the privateer that whilst Captain Dennis was on board of the privateer as the captain of her, whilst her real captain was Jean Antoine Berard; that on the very day Captain Dennis left the privateer, Captain Berard went to the city of New York, and in the course of three or four days afterwards, a boat came down to the privateer so anchor within the Hook, with forty-eight chests of gunpowder, each chest weighing two hundred pounds; that the privateer was careened and dried at Port de Paix, where she arrived and delivered forty-five of the chests of gunpowder to General Lafeuix; that soon after Captain Dennis had left the privateer as aforesaid, and whilst the privateer was in the commerce on board of her, she received an order at Port de Paix; that when the privateer left Philadelphia she had about thirty men on board, who were all sailors or volunteers belonging to the privateer, as is believed; that at Port de Paix the privateer was careened and her bottom tallowd, and she took in four pieces of cannon, (being four pounders) some fresh biscuit, and some mutton and blackes to replace some seamen who had deserted, and Captain Berard there also received a private's commission from General Lafeuix; that from Port de Paix the privateer went to the Cape, and thence on a cruise, and in the course of three days cruising she took the prize in question.

The above are some of the matters testified on the part of the libellant, but the examinations on either side are not yet closed, and will be the testimony in the cases. by a sense of duty to communicate the information. The suit against the privateer is also at issue, and nearly the same testimony which is above stated has already been taken in its and further testimony, to put it on the same footing with the suit against the prize, will be procured without delay. The final issue of the suit against the privateer is altogether a problem; but I have no doubt that at least probable cause will appear to justify her seizure and detention.

If any further information should be wanted, I will furnish it as soon as I am favored with your commands. In the mean time I have the honor to be, in behalf of Mr. Harrison, sir, &c.

"With respect to the suit instituted against the French privateer La Vengeance, I have to refer you to Colonel Troup's letter of the 7th inst. with this single addition—that as the suit was commenced on behalf of the United States, from motives of duty, upon such evidence as (if unimpeached) would afford not only probable cause for seizure, but just ground for condemnation, so it will immediately be discontinued, from the same motives, if it shall be found that the weight of testimony is in favor of the claimant."

No. 75.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War of the United States, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 9th Vendémiaire, (September 24, 1795,) 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

I have duly received Mr. Randolph's letter of the 11th August, in which he enclosed copies of that written from New York on the subject of the privateer La Vengeance, and of the documents produced at the suit pending in the district court of that city against the privateer and her prize.

My objections are still the same, and I should have renewed my representations, if the weak replies I had receive had not led me to imagine that I had little to hope from such a step. I therefore thought it my duty to wait until I should be possessed of authentic documents to discuss, at the same time, the points of right and fact.

These documents have come to hand.

I begin with the point of right.

The prize made by the privateer Vengeance of a Spanish ship is arrested upon the allegation of the consul of that nation, stating that this privateer had been armed in the United States.

From this simple allegation, without an affidavit or other testimony, the attorney of the district had the privateer arrested. He pretends that, affidavits are not necessary, and that, if the decree should be favorable to the privateer, the damages accruing from her arrestation shall be borne by the plaintiff. Besides, he undertakes to assert that the prize cannot escape condemnation.

It is not my province to dispute the responsibility for the damages and interest resulting from the arrest of the privateer, which is a matter foreign to the subject of the prize, and a punishment for a supposed violation of your neutrality. Therefore, I shall not discuss this part of the allegations of Mr. Attorney, which appears to me erroneous; it is not doubted that, in the final issue, the French privateer will have a right to claim damage and interest from the American Government.

But I again recur to the assertion, that an affidavit is not necessary for ordering the arrest of a vessel.

What is the law, what is the usage, which establishes the prosecution for repression of an offence, before it be ascertained that it has been committed; and what certainty then had Mr. Attorney? His opinion. Upon what is it founded? The complaint of the Spanish agent, since there was not a single affidavit.

Now, sir, upon mere suspicions, which the enemy interest will not fail always to bring forward, the French privateers are to be subjected to seizure! Such a measure tends to nothing less than to paralyze the seventeenth article of our treaty.

 Doubtless, sir, this is the intention of your Government. No, the United States, under the veil of friendship, would not endeavor, by indirect means, to abuse the advantages of an alliance cemented by French blood.

I therefore protest against this illegal arrest—I request you, sir, to examine into the irregularity of it, and to order its removal.

You may do this, as it was the act of an agent of the executive power with the courts, and not that of the judiciary.

I return to the point of fact, that is to say, to the arming of the privateer in the United States. Like Mr. Attorney, I had my conviction; it was only a moral, but it is now a physical one; among the numerous written documents which have come to my hands, I confine myself to the choice of four; of these I transmit you copies.

The first is the declaration of General Laveaux, stating that the vessel called la Dorade arrived at Port de Paix without any armament whatever; that she was sold to citizen Jacques Rouge, armed by him as a privateer, partly at that place, and partly at the Cape. This declaration is certified by the municipality of Port de Paix.

The second is a declaration of citizen Villatte, commandant at the Cape, stating that this privateer sailed from that place with six cannon.

The third is the bill of sale of la Dorade, done at Port de Paix, the 24th last Floreal, with an exact and minute inventory of every thing belonging to the vessel.

The fourth, and last, is a declaration of the master warden of the port of Philadelphia, proving that this vessel sailed without an augmentation of force.

The reading of these papers will convince you, sir, that Mr. Attorney was not founded in the opinion which he looked upon as a sufficient reason for authorizing and justifying the seizure, against which I complain.

As though this seizure were insufficient, Mr. Attorney, upon what foundation I know not, (probably, also, according to his opinion) has ordered a second seizure of the vessel, under the pretext that she exported arms and ammunition from the United States. I do not discuss, also, sir, this difficulty, superfluous in the main, but I complain of a step which is a formal insult, an outrage against the French republic, and myself as its representative.

The first point of difficulty was in discussion; I complained; a negotiation was opened between you and me; and this is the time Mr. Attorney chose to repeat the very thing about which I was complaining. He has violated usage and decency in the most wanton manner, since, admitting the second seizure to be well founded, it was useless for securing the penalty, as long as the first had not been removed.

I request justice, sir, and I am so much the more persuaded that you will readily render it to me, as you will be perfectly convinced that this is considerably less a question of the particular interest of the privateer, than of maintaining the principles of the alliance, and the rights of the French republic, for which you have repeated to me assurances of attachment which leave me no doubt of your dispositions.

Accept, sir, &c.

P. A. ADET.
The French Republic.

Etienne Laveaux, Commander in Chief of the French Windward Islands in America.

At the request of the owners and captain of the ship la Vengeance, formerly la Dorade, to certify all the facts and circumstances known to us relative to this vessel,

We, rendering homage to the truth, declare, that, on the 15 Floreal last (5 May, O. S.) the vessel called la Vengeance, formerly la Dorade, anchored in the road of Port de Paix, about eight or nine o'clock in the morning that, immediately, the captain, named Francis Michel, was brought before us, as is customary, and, in presence of part of the army, declared that he had been charged, by the agents of the French republic near the United States, with a secret mission, of which he perfectly acquitted himself. This I do not conceive my duty to detail here. The vessel arrived as a merchant vessel, without either cannon or musket of any kind, and but slightly manned.

This mission being fulfilled, Francis Michel, attorney of John Baron, owner of the said vessel, sold her to citizen Jacques Rouge, of this town, agreeably to a bill of sale executed before Domingueaux and his partner, notaries at Port de Paix, the 24th last Floreal.

The citizen Jacques Rouge having chosen Jean Antoine Berard to command this vessel, requested letters patent from me to arm her as a privateer. I granted them on the 27th of last Floreal, and they were registered in the records of the admiralty of this town, and in the office of the civil ordonnateur. Under these circumstances, citizen Berard could find very few. He asked me for three three-pounders, which were in one of our forts; I promised them to him, but having been obliged to erect a battery which was indispensable, I was under the necessity of omitting to fulfil it. He then requested permission to go to Borgue, for others: I could not permit him, on account of the utility of the artillery there. In a word, he found, at Port de Paix, but two cannon, three at Couletarine, which he purchased, with my permission, of citizen Florestal, an inhabitant of that town.

Under these circumstances, citizen Berard went to the Cape to complete his armament. As I could not, after what had been done to the republic, refuse to accelerate the arming of this vessel, I wrote to Vilatte, commandant at the Cape, to render him assistance.

All the facts above related are perfectly true. It is a matter of public notoriety, that la Vengeance arrived here a commercial vessel; that she was sold to Rouge, a citizen of Port de Paix; that he obtained a commission for cruising against the enemies of the republic; that she was commanded by Jean Antoine Berard; that her armament begun here, under my own eyes; that it was completed at the Cape, in virtue of my letter to the commandant; that he sailed thence, on a cruise, against the enemies of the republic; therefore, the prize made by the said Berard, being by a privateer, legally armed, and agreeing to the laws of the French republic one and indivisible, cannot be contested.

In faith whereof, we have delivered the present declaration, to serve and avail when and where it ought.

WARDEN'S OFFICE, July 3, 1795.

Sir:

I beg leave to inform you, in regard of the schooner Rose, that she cleared out at the custom house, on the 18th day of March, under the name of the Dorada. I never heard of her being permitted to clear out at the collector's office, until the 21st of the month, which I heard from the collector himself, that she was permitted to clear out. The complaint coming from the collector and surveyor, I concluded that the officers of Government were satisfied that there was no augmentation of force, or they would not have permitted her clearing out for the West Indies. I applied to the Governor for an order to let her pass the fort, which he gave at his own house to the officers of the fort, to let her pass on producing her clearance from the collector of the port, which I transmitted to the fort.

"Herewith I transmit the translations of a letter of the 9th ultimo, and other papers, received from Mr. Adet, the minister of the French republic, relative to the privateer La Vengeance, arrested by process from the district court of New York, and her Spanish prize libelled in the same court. I beg you will again examine this business, and, as early as possible, favor me with such information as will enable me to make an answer to Mr. Adet, that may or ought to be satisfactory."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE October 16, 1795.

Sir:

A divided attention between two departments I must pray you to accept as an apology for my delays in answering your letters and communicating expected information. I now enclose an extract of a letter from Mr. Harrison, the district attorney for New York, relative to the privateer La Vengeance, and her prize; by which you will perceive that, whatever may be the event of the suits pending in court, concerning her and her prize, the public officer, Mr. Harrison, is supported, in his proceedings, by the laws and usages of this country, upon such evidence and information as, in the case referred to, were produced.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 82.

Extract of a letter from Richard Harrison, Esq. District Attorney of New York, to Colonel Pickering, dated October 3, 1795.

These observations will naturally lead to the case of the privateer La Vengeance, against which two suits have been brought on behalf of the United States; the suit against the prize being of a private nature, wherein, as attorney of the United States, I have no concern.

It is rather extraordinary that the mere institution of these suits, for offenses against the laws of our country, should be considered as a just cause of complaint by the agents of a foreign nation; since, until the final sentence of the constitutional tribunals, it cannot be legally discerned whether the complaints are well founded, vexatious, or properly instituted upon probable cause, though the scale of evidence may finally preponderate in favor of the accused.

Without advertising, however, to this point with the particularity it may deserve, I proceed to observe that, previous to the commencement of the first suit, such information was given as afforded, in my judgment, a probable cause for the prosecution. This did not arise, as the French minister supposes, from simple suspicion, or the mere allegation of the Spanish consul. That gentleman laid before me papers, carrying every appearance of authenticity, relative to the fitting out and arming of the privateer; and I had assurances, upon which I could depend, that direct evidence would be produced of illegal measures for this purpose, taken either in Philadelphia or elsewhere in the river Delaware.

Under these circumstances I judged it my duty to proceed officially, for the only breach of law with which I was then acquainted, and I should have esteemed myself culpable if I had neglected to do so. It was sufficient that I was assured of having the evidence at a proper time to manifest the propriety of the suit, and before that time it was unnecessary to possess it. Neither the laws of the country, nor the practice of our courts, required the filing of any previous affidavit where the suit was commenced by the attorney of the United States on their behalf; and such a practice might often be attended with pernicious consequences, by disclosing the name of the person who gave the information, and the nature of the evidence to be produced. Whatever, therefore, may be the ideas of persons unacquainted, or but little acquainted, with our laws, must be wholly immaterial upon this subject; but they may rest assured that I should never resort to any more pretences in justification of my conduct, and I may safely challenge any person to produce the law which would render such an affidavit necessary, unless in case of a common informer.

The first suit against the privateer having been thus commenced, the testimony of her illegal armament, within the United States, has been actually furnished by more than one witness; but, in the course of the hearing, such a variety of clasping and conflicting evidence was produced, that it became impossible to foresee the event. This, you may remember, was, at a very early period, said to be problematical, though no doubt was entertained that probable cause would appear to justify the seizure and detention.

During the time of exhibiting the testimony in the case originally commenced, it appeared, in evidence, by the showing of the claimant's witnesses, that the privateer had been employed in exporting ammunition from the United States, at a period when such exportation was prohibited. Had the fact been known in season, it would have formed a charge in the original suit; but, that not being the case, as soon as I was informed upon the subject, it became my

FRANCE.

In this mode business, however, I have undoubtedly acted from my own opinion, founded upon such evidence as came to my knowledge; and as, in similar cases, I must necessarily, in the first instance, be unacquainted with the opinions and convictions of others, I know of no other rule by which I can be guided, unless when I am honored with the directions of the Chief Executive, it may be unnecessary, if not improper, for me to enter into a minute discussion of the papers produced by the French minister, or the evidence respecting the cause whilst it is a subject of judicial examination. Permit me, however, to observe: 1st, That, even if they are sufficient to warrant the acquittal of the privateer, it is by a means follow that the seizure and detention were improper; otherwise, it would be necessary, April 21st, to try the case before the commencement of the suit. 2dly, That the bill of sale has been produced to the district court on behalf of the claimant, and will receive from the justices of that court its proper interpretation, either as evidence of a genuine contract, or as a mere cloak to disguise the transaction. 3dly, That General Laveaux's certificate (whatever respect it may be entitled to) is not to be considered as evidence in the cause; and, if it could be made so, the claimant would be very embarrassing of producing it, on account of its differing from the witnesses. And, 4thly, That the certificates of Mons. Villette and Mr. Falconer are such as do not contradict the supposition that the vessel may have been prepared and armed for war service in the port of Philadelphia, and that she may have received it on board before she quitted the Delaware, though she acquired additional force in the West Indies.

On the 10th of December, 1795, An appeal was interposed, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Harrison, and I, had a conference with the Spanish consul, at which we assured him it was our unanimous opinion that there was little or no probability of ultimate success in the cause, and therefore we could not advise the continuance of the appeal. The Spanish counsel, in reply, asked us for our opinion in writing, that he might transmit it to the Spanish consul general at Philadelphia, and receive his instructions. We accordingly delivered to the Spanish consul a written opinion, subscribed with our names, in which we unanimously treated the cause as one that was scarcely hopeless, and strongly disconquenanced the further prosecution of it. We did not preserve a copy of this opinion, or I should now transmit it to you: the original, I understand, is in the hands of the Spanish consul general. In the course of a few days, after the Spanish consul had received our written opinion, he informed me that the agents of the Spanish Government at Philadelphia, having taken charge of the suit merely as public officers, felt themselves bound to pursue the straight course marked out by the laws of the United States, and to apply for the judgment of the court sitting in the last resort. This answer was decisive with the counsel for Don Diego Pintado. They were obliged in faithfulness to the trust reposed in them to prosecute the appeal and prepare it for argument at the circuit court appointed to be held on the 5th of April. This was done, but without the aid of counsel. The circuit court was a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore it was necessary to comply with the instructions which the Spanish consul had previously received from the consul general. An early opportunity was afterwards taken by the counsel of Don Diego Pintado, to impress upon the mind of the Spanish consul, that it would greatly improve the interest of the said Pintado, if the case was submitted to the circuit court, and forming a part of the record, which would probably be conclusive upon the supreme court, and compel it to affirm the judgment of the circuit court. The same considerations, nevertheless, which led to the prosecution of the appeal from the sentence of the district court, determined the agents of the Spanish Government not to distrue the writ of error. All the preparatory steps to proper to put the cause in such a state as to entitle it to be argued at the next supreme court, at which the writ of error was returnable, were consequently taken. The term of the supreme court commenced on the first Monday in August, 1796, at Philadelphia, and on that day, if older instructions had not been heard, they would have been heard. During the term, however, the cause was heard, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

In a cause removed into the supreme court by a writ of error, that court is not authorized to issue execution to enforce its judgment, but is required to remand the cause to the circuit court, by special mandate, for execution. In the interval between the rendering of judgment by the supreme court, and the presenting of the mandate, to the circuit court, all further proceedings in the cause are necessarily suspended, and nothing can be done but by the courtesy of the unsuccessful party. The circuit court for this district sat on the 5th of September last, which was rather more than a fortnight after the decision of the supreme court; and yet no advantage was taken or attempted to be taken by the counsel of Don Diego Ponte's suspension which the law created. So far from it that I wrote a letter to Mr. Duponceau, in Philadelphia, the very day I heard the supreme court had given judgment, in which I mentioned that the matter had been brought to their attention in the circuit court at the instant, and that a judgment would be now had. Mr. Duponceau's term was likely to be short; and that I was willing to concur in arrangements for the immediate assessment of the damages which the circuit court might award to the captors; and I added that the supreme court having decided upon the merits of the case, I wished he would send the captain of the privateer, then in Philadelphia, to me, for the money should be paid to me on account of the judgment rendered in the circuit court, and to be paid to the circuit court, when the money should be paid to me, which would be accordingly the usual course in similar cases, would not have received their damages until after the circuit court, which will be held on the 5th of April, 1797.

From this state of facts, I presume that it will be evident to every unprejudiced mind that Mr. Adet's charge against me is groundless. I have frequently said, I was the first to insist upon the legal and constitutional liberty of the counsel for the captors, as witnesses, of the fairness and propriety of my conduct in every stage of the case; and if they said one syllable to my prejudice, I would plead guilt, and submit to be banished from my country, as unworthy of its confidence. I make use of strong terms, because I know that my integrity places me upon high and solid ground. If Mr. Duponceau relative to my conduct, he would have been told that the tenor of it throughout the case was fair, honorable, and liberal. I am possessed of several letters from Mr. Duponceau, in which he emphatically expresses this opinion, and returns me his thanks.

Not having been concerned in the suit against the privateer, I refer you to the attorney of the district for such information respecting it as he may suppose it proper to give you.

With sentiments of the purest esteem, I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT TROUP.

Mr. Harrison, District Attorney of New York, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, December 12, 1796.

Sir: Mr. Adet's long and extraordinary note of the 15th ultimo could not fail of exciting both surprise and attention. The variety of ill-founded charges which it contained against the most revered and respectable characters in our country, and its general strain of censure upon the wise and impartial measures of Government, had a natural tendency to make the reproaches it contained upon inferior individuals, be considered rather as marks of honorable distinction, than as indicative of disapprobation. The public, and I am conscious that, as far as I was concerned, in his censure, they were wholly unmerited, I had balanced, with myself, whether it could be proper to add any further statement to those communications respecting the case of La Vengeance, which had already been transmitted to the principal newspapers. But, lastly, having wanted a complete vindication of the sentiments of my public and private character, as an officer of justice, as far as I was personally concerned, and in deference to the request contained in your letter of the 10th instant, I shall briefly recapitulate the circumstances attending the several suits against the privateer, with the particular reasons that influenced my conduct as prosecutor for the public. I trust that the detection of the invidious motives of which I have been actuated, but also the propriety of the measures which I thought it right to pursue.

About the latter end of June, or beginning of July, 1795, the privateer La Vengeance arrived with a valuable prize in the harbor of New York, at a time when I was absent from the State, upon a tour to the eastward for the recovery of my honor. Upon the 20th of July, if I am rightly informed, a suit was commenced, on the admiralty side of the district court, by the Spanish consul, on behalf of the original owner of the prize, upon an allegation that the privateer had been fitted out in the United States. This cause was commenced in my absence, by the advice of Colonel Hamilton and Mr. Trump. I had no participation in the business, nor any knowledge of it, until it had been applied to. I should not have thought it incompatible with my station to have been originally concerned for the libellant; as the free exercise of profession, in all causes where the United States are not parties, belongs to the district attorneys. Before my return to New York the cause had already made some progress; the libel was filed, the prize arrested, and, leaving the claim, the owner, whom he alleged to be the owner of the privateer. Mr. Adet's insinuation, therefore, that the prize was arrested in consequence of any exertion or appearance of mine, is totally unfounded, and to be classed with the other groundless representations by which he is distinguished.

Upon my return, the consul of the King of Spain, at New York, complained to me, in my official capacity, of a violation of law on the part of the privateer, in consequence of which a Spanish subject had been injured. This complaint was entitled to attention, both from its own nature and the situation of the complainant. I could not be under the improper bias from any connexion with the prize cause, even if I was capable of being so biased; because, at that time, I had no concern in it; and, therefore, Mr. Adet's observation that I acted "without laying aside my office of attorney for the captured," is equally unfounded with the one above noticed.

Upon making the inquiries which I supposed requisite, I found at least a probability that the complaint respecting the privateer was true. This probability arose from what I considered as affording the certainty of material proof: and, therefore, in conformity with my duty, I commenced a prosecution, grounded upon the statute prohibiting the armed privateers in our ports. In the course of proceeding against the privateer, it was manifest that the cause in the United States and that against the owners were substantially the same; and it was found that the evidence taken in the one cause should be used in both. After some time, Colonel Hamilton's numerous engagements rendered it impracticable for him to attend constantly to the examination of witnesses, and as questions were raised with respect to the cause against the prize, which did not emerge in that of the privateer, I was engaged to assist as counsel in the prize cause, continuing alone as to every thing that respected the public prosecution. This I may aver to have been carried on with the utmost fairness on the part of the United States, and no methods whatever were employed to delay the decision, which, however, was necessarily retarded, in part by the time consumed in examining the papers of the cause, and in part by the extant situation of New York at that period. Perhaps, too, there never were causes in which more contradictory and irreconcilable evidence was offered, and in which the minds of the auditors were more divided as to the real state of facts. The judge of the district took a considerable time to examine the evidence and form his opinion, and though his decision was in favor of the claimants, yet he expressly declared that there was probable cause for the seizure, which he had been considered as sufficient to justify a prosecution on the part of the public; and I believe that whoever will examine the mass of jarring evidence that was taken upon this occasion, will accord in that opinion, though he may think that, under all the circumstances, the facts do not establish a conviction of a deprivation of property by force. In the prize cause, I united with my associates in recommending the like submission in cause below. These are all the observations which I think it can be proper to make with respect to the first cause commenced against the privateer.

With respect to the second prosecution, which Mr. Adet says "is principally in question," the facts are these: the examination in the first cause against the privateer, it appeared that a quantity of arms and ammunition had actually been exported in her from the United States at a time when such exportation was prohibited; and though I had been led to suppose, from some of the testimony, that these had formed a part of the privyee's equipment, yet, as this was contested, I thought it my duty to file another libel or information, stating the exportation as a breach of the prohibitory law. Mr. Adet is pleased to say, that "this information was made upon the simplest and most obvious evidence; and who, as informers, had to be the provoee of the conviction." In the first part of this assertion, Mr. Adet is certainly mistaken. The information was formed upon the evidence appearing in the other cases, not upon any declaration made by Mr. Giles; and as Mr. Giles was not the informer, but merely the seizing officer. I do not know that he would have been entitled to any share of the property if confiscated.

After the filing of the second information, it is remarkable that Captain Berard (who could best have contradicted the allegations contained in it, if they were not true) does not appear to have claimed oath, as in the other cases, concerning any of the facts which were derived from information probably from him.

In the progress of the case, however, the exportation of cannon is denied; the muskets attempted at one time to be made bowling pieces, and at another the property of passengers; and the powder, with some ball which accompanied it, is alleged to have been an object of the requisition of a French privateer, and to have been afterwards replaced; but without explaining whence, or in what manner, the supply to the frigate was obtained.

Under these circumstances, the judge of the district pronounced sentence of condemnation against the privyee, founding his decree upon the exportation of the muskets, but without giving any direct opinion as to the powder, which, in my judgment, formed the most serious and important question in the case; because, if foreign vessels of war might supply the ships or colonies of their nation with ammunition, from their equipments, and again replace the same, probably within the United States, every prudent and necessary precaution to preserve among us the means of defense, might, at the pleasure of foreigners, be rendered abortive.

The sentence of the district court in this case having been pronounced, an appeal, as slated by Mr. Adet, was interposed by the French consul at New York, and, about this period, a sale of the privyee took place by consent.

If the parties interested supposed that this vessel would sell for no more than a "tenth part of the cost of her armament," it was optional with them to have refused their consent. But the vessel was alluded to, requiring vessels to be given up upon security, under the circumstances stated. No such law was produced by the consul or his attorneys, and it would have been palpably improper that a privyee, condemned by the sentence of a court of justice, should by any act of an officer of the executive government go into the hands of one of its officers without his consent, and at his discretion, which, as I have supposed, has been considered as a deviation from strict neutrality, and might have been productive of serious consequences.

In the month of April last, the appeal in the case of the privyee came on to be heard before Judge Chase, in the circuit court of the district of New York. Whatever might have been the expectations of the consul or his attorneys, they did not choose to rest their appeal upon the evidence taken in the district court, but, upon the first day of the hearing, produced new witnesses. After these had been heard, the argument was commenced for the appellant, and answered on the part of the respondents; but as the judge plainly intimated his opinion, for confirming the former sentences, unless further evidence could be produced, to a particular point, the appellant's counsel applied for, and obtained, a delay of two days; and, in that interval, by some fortunate casualty, met with a witness, who had only been a few months at New York, and was able to remove every difficulty.

In consequence of this new evidence, Judge Chase thought proper to reverse the sentence of the district court, condemning the privyee; but he not only certified that there was probable cause for the prosecution, but, as the in-

This is the case court had been obtained under extraordinary circumstances, and as the question respecting the powder still appeared to me of the utmost importance, I thought it my duty to enter an appeal to the supreme court, and to prepare a state of the case, that the superior officers of Government might judge whether it should be prosecuted or abandoned.

To that end, in the preparation of the information, any to this cause, should be deemed necessary. I must refer to the state of the case above mentioned, and which was transmitted by me to the Secretary of the Treasury. I have only further to observe that I am ignorant how the officers of the district court were "interested in the condemnation of the privyee or her prize." I believe that the fees of the clerk and marshal were the same, whether they were acquitted or condemned: and I am certain, that, as to myself, the charges against me were not at all depend upon that circumstance. I hope, indeed, that I shall at all times be incapable of commencing, or carrying on, a prosecution merely with a view to my own private emolument. I am ready, at any time, to meet inquiry upon this subject, and I am ready to declare, that the enlightened country, so far be blinded by mercenary motives as to prostitute his office for the gratification of them, would be soon removed from it with ignominy, if he should even escape any other punishment.

I have only to add that, with the highest respect, I have the honor to be, &c. RICH. HARRISON.

CASE OF THE CASSIS.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 29th Thermidor, (August 9, 1795, O. S.)

3rd year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: The corvette de Cassis, belonging to the French republic, is detained in the port of Philadelphia; her captain cited before an American court; and she was looked upon and registered in virtue of an American act, imprisoned, if I had not ordered the consul to give bail for him. The proceedings were carried still further: an attempt was made to arrest him on board his vessel.

The same is the case of Capt. Morgan, who was arrested on board his vessel, and who has since been released.

We should distinguish, sir, between the acts of a private citizen and those of a public agent. The law is universal that private individuals should be amenable for offenses committed by them in a foreign territory, to the courts of the country where the act was committed, according to the laws of the country. But the acts of a man in the character of a public agent are not his own; he represents his Government; and if he conducts so as to excite the complaints of the citizens of another State, or of this State, justice should not be required of him, but of the Government from whom he holds the authority in virtue of which he has done the act complained of.

It is his Government alone that is to judge whether the orders it has given have been well executed or not, and to approve or punish his act, accused of an improper act towards neutral or allied nations, and to make such reparation as seems just and equitable. Therefore, the complaints should lie against him before it, either directly, or through the medium of its own Government. Were it otherwise, one Government would become amenable to another; which would reverse the first principles of the rights of nations.

This incontestable principle is corroborated by the 16th article of our treaty, which states literally, "and that more effectual care may be taken for the security of the subjects and inhabitants of both parties, that they suffer no injury by the men of war or privyees of the other party, all the commanders of the ships of His Most Christian Majesty and of the United States, and all their subjects and inhabitants, shall be forbidden to do any injury or damage to the other side; and if they act to the contrary they shall be punished; and shall, moreover, be bound to make satisfaction for all damages and the interest thereof, by repairment, under the penalty of their persons and goods." This article evidently carries with it the right of causing the officers, of both nations, to be tried by their own Government, as it says that it "shall be forbidden," &c.

This prohibition is made to the French by the French Government; to the Americans by that of the United States, the latter who makes a punishment for all the preceding articles of the treaty; and the Government makes the right of punishing infractions of it. Hence it follows that the commander of the corvette Le Cassin cannot be punished but by the French Government, should he merit punishment from the complaints which shall be exhibited to it by yours.

The conduct of the United States should not lead them to imagine that she will ever be inattentive to their just complaints; she has been, and always will be, eager to repair, in an amiable and complete manner, the slightest injury done to your rights.

What motive then could have led the American courts to arrogate to themselves the cognizance of the conduct of French agents? It gives me pain to disclose the matter to you. Yet, sir, it is not the first case that has presented: General Collot is brought here before a court, as Governor of Guadeloupe. I shall leave the honor of addressing an official note to you on this subject.

I return to the affair of the corvette Le Cassin. She is detained here by the arrestation of her captain, which is a violation of the 19th article of our treaty, of which the following is a transcript: "In case the subjects and inhabitants of either party, with their shipping, whether public, and of war, or private, and of merchants, shall be forced, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates, or enemies, or any other urgent necessity, for seeking of shelter and harbor, to retreat and enter into any of the rivers, bays, roads, or ports, belonging to the other party, they shall be received and treated with all humanity and kindness, and enjoy all friendly protection and help; and they shall be permitted to repair, at reasonable rates, with victuals and all things needful for the sustenance of their persons, or repairation of their ships, and conveyance of their voyage; and they shall no ways be detained or hindered from returning out of the said parts or roads, but may remove and depart when and whether they please, without any let or hindrance."

This arrest is likewise in this case very injurious to the interests of the republic, as the vessel is on a very important mission, and should depart without delay. I return to you the secret that I have placed in your hands, and the secret that my friend the President has promised not to let disappear. She has not the least idea of imagining that she will ever be inattentive to their just complaints; she has been, and always will be, eager to repair, in an amiable and complete manner, the slightest injury done to your rights.

The desire which you have more than once testified to me, sir, of rigorously maintaining the observance of our treaties, leaves me no doubt of your disposition to do justice to my demands. I therefore confine myself to request you to accelerate your answer, and the solution of this affair.

Accept, sir, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 24 Thermidor, (11th August, 1795, O. S.),

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have just received the documents you will find enclosed. They relate to the corvette of the republic the Cassin. I had every reason to hope, that the letter which I wrote you on the 29th Thermidor, (9th August, 1795) would have been productive of its full effect. I cannot but consider the arrest of the corvette the Cassin as contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of France with the United States. Consequently, I renew my request, and order you to observe the execution of this article. Besides, I will observe to you that in an original letter the French Government has ordered me to claim the literal execution of our treaties, and that you will never claim the like of the French republic in vain.

I cannot credit the report made to the consul at Philadelphia. I cannot believe that it should be undertaken to take away the sails and apparel of a public ship, and consequently I forbade the consul to give security for the corvette the Cassin. It is for you to judge, sir, what is proper to be done in this affair, which appears to me to be more important than can be well imagined. I will close this letter by observing to you that the Cassin is to sail in six days upon an important errand.

Accept, &c.

We, the officers, sailors, and soldiers, composing the crew of the corvette of the republic the Cassin, commanded by S. B. Davis, lieutenant of the navy, being at the wharf of Philadelphia, certify, that, on the 24th Thermidor, in the 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (or 11th August, 1795, O. S.) about six o'clock in the morning, there came on board an American, holding in his hand a large piece of paper, which was written upon: he addressed himself to one of us, who was officer of the guard; he spoke in the American language; not understanding us, he wished to understand the French language, to be pleased to interpret in French what the American wanted; and after speaking with him a short time in the American language, he told us that the bearer of the written paper had come in behalf of the police of Philadelphia; that his business was against the captain and the corvette, and that he desired to affix the said paper to the mainmast. We answered him, by the same means, that the corvette belonged to the republic that we could not permit any thing to be affixed but by order of the representative of the French nation; telling him, besides, also by means of the same interpreter, that, if the American nation had any complaints to make against the republic, there were ministers or representatives of France in the United States, by whom it might lay its demands or complaints before them. To which we answered us that he did not come of his own accord; that he must do his duty; and since we would not permit him to affix his said paper, that he would render an account of it to his superiors, and that orders would be given to the fort to hinder the departure of the corvette and to arrest her, and finally ended. Of the whole of what is written above, and of the minute, we have made the present report, to be immediate sent to the representative of the French people resident at Philadelphia, to serve and avail as it ought: Done on board the said corvette, the day, month, and year, aforesaid: this we signed after it was read with a loud voice in presence of the crew.

The Consul of Philadelphia to citizen Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary from the French republic to the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 24th Messidor, 3d year of the French republic, and indivisible.

In conformity with your letter of the 31st of Thermidor, I gave security for the lieutenant of the navy, Davis, commander of the public corvette the Cassius. I this moment understand that an American public officer went on board of the Cassius, and wished to post up a paper on the main-mast: the officer who then commanded opposed it. The judgment respecting Captain Davis, which was to have been pronounced to day has been adjourned till Friday. At present, security is demanded for the vessel, in default of which, they will go on board and take away the sails, apparel, &c.

Shall I give security in the name of the republic to the value of this vessel? I cannot do it as an individual, for I have not the means.

An answer will be called for in four hours. I expect by that time to receive yours. A true extract.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 1st Fructidor, 3d year of the French republic, and indivisible, (August 18, 1795, O. S.)

SIR: I have this moment received a letter from the captain of the corvette le Cassius, informing me that the practice made use of to corrupt his crew has succeeded. Eighteen of them deserted yesterday. Thieves were last night committed on board by unknown persons, and the captain still apprehends other disorders.

Should I be able to go to the district attorney, or not be able to fulfill the mission with which she is charged, and from those cases the interest of the republic suffer an injury, permit me to inform you, sir, that I must impute it only to a want of energy in doing justice to my equitable representations. I ought not, nor can I address myself to any person but yourself; I do not know, nor ought I to know, any other than the Government of the United States; I cannot admit, under any shape, in coming from the execution or non-execution of the treaties. If these courts are the first to violate them, I can only apply to the Government for a redress of that violation; otherwise it would be rendering the agents of the French Government, the French Government itself, amenable to these tribunals; which would be reversing principles.

I cannot accede to the proposition of the attorney to furnish security for the vessel. If security must be furnished it should be done by the Government of the United States, as it must answer for the execution of the treaties to the French republic, and as the 9th article of our treaty is violated by the conduct of the district court of Pennsylvania.

It seems to me, sir, that there is a mode for determining this affair. The Government of the United States may ask and obtain a prohibition from the supreme court to the inferior courts, stopping proceedings similar to the case in question. Then, sir, you might take such measures as you think proper for liberating the corvette le Cassius and her captain.

Such are the observations which I have to present to you. I venture to hope that you will be pleased to take them into consideration, and render full operation to our treaty.

Accept, sir, &c.

No. 90.
Mr. Pickering to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 25, 1795.

SIR: The President of the United States having assigned to me a temporary agency in the Department of State, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Randolph, your letter of the 10th instant was consequently put into my hands. I received it on Saturday, the 22d, and have since lost no time in making the inquiries necessary to enable me to return an answer.

The outrage committed towards the republic of France, in the person of your predecessor, by the British ship of war the Africa, being a violation of the neutrality of the United States, and of the laws of nations, engaged the immediate attention of our Government. The case was stated to Mr. Hammond, the British minister; but his departure for London, and the consequent transfer of the duties of his office to Mr. Bond, at present chargé des aires of the British Government, have doubtless occasioned some delay. I can, however, assure you that measures have been taken, and will be strictly pursued, for obtaining every reparation in our power for any injuries committed, and for asserting the just rights of the French republic, so far as they have been infringed within the jurisdiction of the United States. You shall be duly informed of the result as soon as it shall be ascertained.

On the subject of the corvette le Cassius, which has been arrested at the suit of a citizen of the United States, Mr. Randolph has already informed you "that, as long as the question is in the hands of our courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them." Of the truth of this principle, I trust no doubt will be entertained. As speedy a decision as the necessary forms of proceeding would admit, you had a right to expect. The answers received to my personal inquiries authorize me to say that, on the part of the court in which the Cassius was libelled, there was no unnecessary delay. Finally, a prohibition to the district court was moved for in the supreme court of the United States, where the motion was supported by such an exhibition of facts as induced the court to grant the prohibition; in consequence of which the Cassius was immediately liberated.

But I have since learned that an information has been filed in the circuit court of the United States against le Cassius, as a vessel illegally armed and equipped within the Jurisdiction of the United States.

I believe it will be universally contended that le Cassius is the same vessel which departed from the port of Philadelphia in December last, by the name of les Jumaux. This vessel (les Jumaux) openly resisted, in arms, the authority of our Government, attempted to be enforced against her for a violation of our laws. The circumstances are detailed in the official report of David Robinett, dated January 5, 1795, of which I enclose a copy.

This vessel is also understood to be at present commanded by a citizen of the United States, who went out in her ostensibly as a passenger, and who consequently was on board of her when the laws of the United States were forcibly resisted.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

[1797]

Now, admitting the facts to be as here stated, can it excite any surprise that Le Cassius should be subjected to the course of legal process before the courts of the United States? I persuade myself, sir, that your candor will allow there is ground sufficient to institute a legal inquiry, and to acquit our officers and tribunals of even the suspicion of improper interference in the cause; and that you are pleased to advert to the new treaty between the United States and Great Britain. But, even if it were in operation, which is not the case, the assurances which have been given you are certainly just, that it could not weaken our engagements to France. These are secured by the laws of nations, and by an express stipulation in the treaty itself.

I am, sir, &c.

WILMINGTON, January 6, 1795.

Sir: Your letter of the 29th ultimo, enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Rauwle, also one to the Governor of this State, or the commanding officer of the militia, with one to the marshal of this district, I received the same day at 11 o'clock. The letter to the marshal I immediately forwarded by express, and delivered the other to General Bedford, commanding officer of the militia in this place. He immediately ordered out one hundred and fifty militia, under the command of Major Grantham, who marched to Port Penn with all expedition, as the revenue cutter, under Captain Rualt, lay opposite the Thruam Capps, supposed twenty-five miles below Port Penn. No other vessel could be procured than this cutter. It was thought most advisable to put a captain's command on board of her, with the deputy marshal and deputy collector, on the 1st of January, 1795, they proceeded down the bay. What occurred you will see from the enclosed report, made by my deputy thereon.

GEORGE BUSH,
Collector District of Delaware.

No. 92.

Report of David Robinett, acting as Deputy Collector for the District of Delaware, respecting the ship Jeannieux, Captain Rualt.

December 31, 1794.

Agreeable to orders given to me by George Bush, collector of the district of Delaware, I proceeded to Port Penn in the revenue barge; and, on January 1, 1795, went on board the revenue cutter General Green, commanded by Captain James Montgomery, with Thomas Rodwell, the depot marshal, and Captain Dale of the militia, with about forty men; we proceeded down the bay as far as Bombay Hook, where we found the ship Jeannieux lying at anchor. The cutter then love to near to the ship. The deputy marshal, Captain Montgomery, Captain Dale, Ensign Van Dyke, and myself, boarded the said ship in the cutter's boat, and found her to have no more guns than what appeared she cleared out from Philadelphia, viz: fourteen 6-pounders, and two swivels; her ports were opened for eighteen guns, with ring-bolts, &c.; and appeared to have about forty men on deck (and it was believed a number more in the hold.) She was deep waisted; near five feet high in her waist, and well found. As soon as we boarded her, the commanding officer was asked if the ship was called the Jeannieux, and if his name was Rualt to both of which questions he answered in the affirmative. The marshal and myself made known to Captain Rualt that we were civil officers of the United States, and, by virtue of authority to us given for that purpose, do now seize the ship Jeannieux, for having violated the laws of the United States, by contravening our neutrality; and demanded of the captain, forthwith, to return with his ship to the port of Wilmington to stand trial. Captain Rualt, after a due reflection, submitted reluctantly, and promised to carry the ship back; and he accordingly weighed anchor and stood up the bay about three miles. Soon after, the pilot, named Joseph Brassel, in consequence (as it appeared) of threats from the crew and the command of Captain Rualt (as it was in French) bore away the ship, and stood down the river (again Captain Montgomery ordered the pilot to alter his course and stand up the river) he said he dare not act contrary to Captain Rualt's orders: Captain Montgomery took hold of him to send him on board the cutter, upon which several of the crew seized him, and, by force and violence, detained him. Captain Montgomery then hauled the cutter and ordered her to keep close on board; upon which there was an immediate of citizens to arms; and the boatswain also piped to arms. Captain Montgomery knocked the pipe out of the boatswain's mouth, for which he was very much insulted: so much so that he laid his hand on his sword; and, after which, we were all treated very rude and insulting. They immediately manned their cannon, and brought them to bear on the cutter, and run into the round houses of their arms. Captain Rualt said he could not command his men; that they were determined to go to sea, and would not return; night approaching, it was thought most advisable to leave the ship (though the marshal wished to stay all night.) The Captain said he would not sail that night, but would come to an anchor, which he did; we accordingly returned to the cutter; and, not having sufficient force to stand her cannon, without sacrificing a number of good citizens, and perhaps to no effect, we returned to Port Penn about 10 o'clock that night. The next day Major Grantham put as many men on board the revenue cutter as she could carry, and got a small sloop with the remainder of the troops on board, and the revenue barge, with a determination to board the ship; we went under way, and proceeded down the bay, but could not find the ship; she had taken her departure with a fair wind, and was out of sight. We then returned to Port Penn, and the troops were ordered to their respective places to be dismissed.

WILMINGTON, January 2, 1795.

N. B. The boatswain, a Frenchman, and four of the men, took the ship's boat the night after we left the ship, and made their escape. He says they were discovered just as they left the ship; the officers ordered some of the passengers to fire on them, as they said they were all passengers, but none would fire. He reports they had ninety-five men on board, and plenty of ammunition; the ship, he said, got under way about nine or ten o'clock P. M. the night after we left them.

No. 93.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 1st Vendémiaire, (September 22, 1795, O. S.),

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: Possessing full confidence in the sentiments of the Government of the United States, I presented to it my claims with regard to the corvette Le Cassius. If they were urgent, they were founded in justice. In my last letter to Mr. Rondel, I complained of the arrest of the corvette Le Cassius, in violation of our treaties. My complaints were just, and the supreme, prohibiting the district court from pursuing this affair, is an evidence of it. Individual interest had confounded the principles developed in my letter of the twenty-second Theemander to Mr. Randolph. The supreme court, far from favoring the abuse committed, rendered hommage to them. But, sir, individual interest does not always calculate upon principles: if, in taking a step, it misses the object it proposed to attain, it withdraws, and pursues another route.

The new arrest of the Cassius, perhaps, furnishes us with a proof of this truth. Perhaps the individual who first induced our vessel to have been induced, under the shadow of your laws, to invent the story which compelled the authority to cause the Cassius to be arrested anew. Has Mr. Ketland, who perhaps informed against the corvette Le Cassius, as having armed in the United States, wished only to serve the interest and feeling of his country, but he has perhaps dictated the steps? His origin: his connections in this city; the desire of serving the country which gave him birth, by paralyzing in your ports a vessel of the republic; by embarrassing the American Government between its laws and the treaty; by troubling the harmony which subsists between your country and mine, and which certain people are interested in destroying these, perhaps, are the true motives of an information colored with the specious love of the laws. I am far from insisting on these conjectures. I conceive I might have spared them, but they presented themselves to my imagination; and the confidence which your character inspires in me, doubtless authorizes me to transmit them to you.

Mr. Ketland, sir, in my opinion, under all circumstances, it appears to me that his information, whether founded or not, does not change the state of things, and that the violation of our treaty is not less manifest.

I shall not lead you to observe, sir, in order to support the conjectures I have presented to you, that the information on which Mr. Pickering acted was the very day in which the seizure of the Cassius was taken off. I shall not wait to give you new suppositions, which, perhaps, are not destitute of foundation, but will immediately pass to the proofs in support of my opinion before I inform you of the course which these circumstances oblige me to take.

I conceive, sir, that in admitting the armament of the Cassius in the United States, her seizure is invalid: for this vessel now belongs to the republic; and the nineteenth article of our treaty expressly states, that State vessels may freely enter and sail from the ports of the United States without receiving the least hindrance. The literal meaning of the article then permits the entry of the Cassius. If it were otherwise, the republic would become (in the hypothesis of armament in the United States) responsible for the faults or wrongs of an individual. A vessel, by changing owner, would then always be a security for the faults of her first proprietor. If a frigate of the republic should take an English vessel armed in the United States, and if, from the fortune of war, the Cassius should fall into the hands of these vessels, they in their turn would seize the Cassius. This conclusion, sir, naturally results from the state of things, but it is presumable that Mr. Ketland would not draw it if the English flag had waived on board the Cassius.

In the distribution of ordinary justice, would it be equitable to seize the arms of a citizen, because, before they belonged to the United States, they had been the property of a subject against its own will? Would the laws of the most enlightened nations, from this principle, be absolved of the crime of which they had been the instrument? Would their new owner, by possessing them, participate in the crime of their first proprietor, and if he were deprived of them for that reason, would he not have a right to complain? Whether the question relates to a subject or a nation, the principles are the same, justice is the same; and in either case, it would be an unreasonable punishment to a man if his property was to be injured, so would a nation, if the nature of the relations and circumstances were always the same. Is not the example which I have just cited applicable to the arrest of the Cassius?
The republic, therefore, have a right to complain of the arrest of this vessel. She then has a right to demand the execution of the nineteenth article of her treaty with the United States, since no subsequent stipulation has suspended the execution of it.

But if, in the hypothesis that the vessel armed in the United States, the Cassius should be delivered to the republic, by a much stronger reason, in the contrary position, should the seizure of this vessel be annulled. You know, as well as I do, sir, that the pretext for the arrest of the Cassius, that the vessel was armed without the consent of the United States, that the name of Le Jumeaux, was formerly armed in the port of Philadelphia. But, sir, when this vessel arrived last year at Philadelphia, (the time of the pretended armament) she was armed with four cannon and two swivels. The proofs of this fact must be in the custom house. It is true, also, that one Guezet was convicted for having attempted to put cannon on board Le Jumeaux, which were intercepted on the way. But this attempt, although punishable in the terms of your laws, is not an armament, and even had it succeeded, it would have been but an augmentation of force, and an augmentation of force is not an armament, and does not, according to the law of 6th June, 1794, occasion the confiscation of the vessel.

If we shall, therefore, qualify the conduct of Mr. Ketland, who could not be ignorant of the law? How will we avoid seeing in it a formal design to insult the French republic, especially when it is observed that he began the proceedings at the very time in which Mr. Pickering was about to decide the case in question? It is true, and well, that, agreeable to your laws, it belongs exclusively to the district courts to decide in cases of forfeiture. Yet, by the circuit court, which you know has only appellate jurisdiction, that they have had the Cassius seized. This court has but two sessions in a year. It sits but once at Philadelphia. The district court, on the contrary, is always open, and by the reasoning to which I have adverted, is it not possible that, by a reasonable delay, by a considerable time elapsing before a decision can be obtained in the circuit court; it will not fail, therefore, to declare itself incompetent. Of what importance is it to the men who have promoted the arrest of the Cassius, to have the right to enjoy the satisfaction of having insulted the French republic with impunity, and of having abused your laws in order to satisfy the hatred of England? Whatever reason I have had to complain on seeing a discussion relative to the execution of our treaties brought before your ordinary tribunal, when it appertains, according to all established rules among nations, to the Government of the United States, although, in such cases, only address myself to the Government of the United States, in order to obtain justice, it being charged with the execution of treaties, yet I did not wish to neglect any means of conciliation in my power, and latterly caused security to be proposed to obtain the reprieve of the vessel, reserving to myself and to you the privilege of determining on an affair unpleasant in all its aspects, by subsequent negotiations.

In these hopes I have been deceived, the security was refused, and the affair is of course abandoned to the decision of the courts.

Justly do I accuse you of any delays which nothing could control, at the expenses occasioned to the republic by supporting a vessel which rendered it no service; fearing with just reason, lest the crew (a part of which has been corrupted) should desert after having been so expensive to the republic, I have ordered her to be disarmed; and from this moment I abandon to the Government of the United States, under the reservation of referring the matter to the French Government. I venture to hope, sir, that the Government of the United States will take proper measures to prevent the forces of the republic from being paralyzed in its ports, and evil minded people from abusing the laws in order to arrest a frigate of a single cannon, when the Cassius, as a State vessel, has no reason why the first frigate which shall arrive from Europe should not be seized as having armed in the United States. Accept, sir, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 1, 1795.

Sir: You have seen that the President of the United States, to maintain the respect due to them, had anticipated towards the British vice consul at Newport, that severity which in your letter of the 10th ult. you considered his offensive conduct required.
In your other letter of the 10th ult., you mention the violation of the rule prescribed by the President (conformably with the usage of the European nations) to regulate the sailing of armed vessels of the belligerent powers in the case of the British ship the Africa, which pursued the Medusa immediately on her leaving the harbor of Newport. This additional injury and insult by Captain Home, commander of the Africa, was represented in the first description of the injuries they put to the United States provision vessels, and was the subject of protestation.

With great pleasure I acknowledge the very different department of the officers and company of the French frigate Medusa, of whom not a whisper of complaint has been lisped, and who I have reason to believe conducted with exemplary propriety, and respect for the laws. Such would be the conduct of all foreign officers, in neutral ports, if these officers were not guarded by their nation's honor or their own.

On the 24th ult. I received your letter of that date, and one of the 23d.

On the subject of the privateer La Vengeance and her prize, of which, till the receipt of your letter of the 29th ult. I had heard nothing written of her, I am directed to assure you I have received a copy of your letter, and of the four papers accompanying it, and desiring him to furnish me with such information as may be necessary to proceed with the case of the Executive of the United States the conduct it ought in this case to observe. Here I must rest this matter until his answer shall be received.

With regard to the armed vessel to Cassius, which is the subject of your letter of the 29d ult. I have made obser...

In the letter which I had the honor to write you on the 5th of August, I said that any delays which had happened in the district court, on the first process against the Cassius, were not to be ascribed to the court: I may now add that the delay was as much on the part of the defendant, as on the part of the court. I believe the defendant was afterwards exhibited to the supreme court, to obtain the prohibition, this step would doubtless have been unnecessary. But that now a new action has been commenced against the Cassius, I must repeat what has been already stated, that as long as the question is in the hands of the courts, the Executive cannot withdraw it from them; and therefore is not chargeable with suffering a violation of the treaty subsisting between the two republics.

Now, by a law of the United States, to which you refer, a vessel so originally armed and equipped is declared to be liable to confiscation. Whether the subsequent transfer of the property to the French republic will exempt it from the operation of the law is a question of some difficulty. How to be brought to the French republic, or to a nation friendly to, that would be the duty of the court to resist its mandate) to remove the question from the judiciary, it would be a violation of the constitution: and you will see immediately that the measure would be as unsafe as unconstitutional.

A fair investigation of the case of the Cassius might lead to this conclusion: that by the law of the United States, she was really liable to confiscation. This admitted, let us suppose her to be now discharged, by the consent of Government, without a trial, and that, in her first cruise, she should take from the enemies of the French republic, prizes of very great value, what would be the consequence? The nations to whom, or to whose subjects, the property belonged, would demand, and expect to be paid, that value, whatever might be the amount, and it might be immense, by the United States.

What also would be the consequence, if the mere act of transferring the property of the vessel would rescue her from condemnation? Obviously that the design of the law, the prevention of illegally fitting out property in the United States for the purposes of war, would be frustrated, and the forfeiture of the vessel with all her equipments, much more than the personal punishment of the agents concerned in fitting her out, was considered by the law as the most effectual guard against the violation of our neutrality. And as to the argument that a vessel may not be a prize, you are taught not to say, that whether the question respects an individual or a nation, principles are the same, justice is the same.

You have informed that the circuit court is a tribunal incompetent to take original cognizance of the question of which we are treating that of this the prosecutor could not be ignorant; and thence you see in this measure the design of a formal insult to the French republic. But, sir, the counsel who have told you that such the law has led you into an error. The question does not respect a confiscation for the breach of the laws of trade, of which the district court has jurisdiction, but for the

You will see the difference between a prosecution grounded on the law of the 5th of June, 1794, when brought against the Cassius, a vessel clearly proved, on a judicial investigation, to have been equipped in violation of that law, and a prosecution, against some coming before you in the court of the United States. No one, it is imagined, would be so unwise, as to attempt an arrest of the latter, and subject himself to the damages recoverable, I presume, for prosecuting a groundless and vexatious suit. Nor can I believe our ministers of justice would be so blind as to discern the entire distinction between the two cases, or that they would not instantly reject the information founded only on pretense, while they as readily admitted the litigation of a question of law, arising on a fact previously established before a judicial tribunal.

After the many assurances which have been given to the ministers of the French republic that the Government of the United States holds itself bound, as well by inclination as by duty, faithfully to observe its treaties, it is unpleasant to receive so frequent intimations of its violating, or suffering them to be violated. There are powerful motives to induce its exact adherence to them, and among these, a regard to its own dignity and reputation, and a love of justice, will, at least. Not the least of these is the what is our most solemn and serious treaties, and custom conversant in our laws, but who ought to be more correct or less sanguine in their legal opinions. In the case you mention, where," neglecting no means of conciliation in your power, you directed security to be offered to receive a release of the vessel," the judge himself, finding no law to warrant the measure, called on the security of the parties; of one of them, more skillful in the laws, or more candid, confessed he knew of none; and, therefore, the security was refused.

After this detail, it will be unnecessary for me to declare to you, sir, that the Government of the United States will not knowingly suffer the force of the republic to be paralyzed, or its vessels detained in our ports by ill-informed people, in abuse of the laws." I am, with great respect, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.
Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 15, 1796.

Sir:

In my correspondence with you on the subject of the armed vessel the Cassius, which you claimed as the property of the French republic, I had the honor to inform you that, such was the nature of the prosecution against her, the Executive must wait for the decision of the judiciary power. The court is now sitting in which that decision was expected.

In order to bring the cause to a fair trial, the attorney for the United States, at the preceding court, filed a suggestion stating that the vessel had, in a foreign port, bona fide become the property of the French republic. I have now to request, sir, that, if you have any documents or testimony to support that suggestion, you will be pleased to communicate the same to me, to be put into the hands of the attorney of the United States; or that you would instruct the legal counsel whom you employ for the French republic to make the proper use of those documents and testimony, to substantiate the claim of the republic to the Cassius.

The informants, by whom the prosecution was commenced, will probably press for a trial at this term.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, the 3rd Floreal, (23rd April, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

You requested, by your letter of the 19th of April, a communication of documents or testimony relative to the purchase, by the French republic, of the corvette le Cassius.

The French republic has not to prove its contracts to foreign courts. I had the honor, sir, in the correspondence which took place between us on the subject of this affair, to declare to you that I knew no relations but with the Executive of the United States, and that, whatever were their interior regulations, I could not, and should not, address myself but to it, in every case for which our reciprocal treaties and conventions have not pointed out a recourse to a particular authority.

The arrest of a State vessel is one of those for which I should address myself only to the American Government; the only fact to be proved is that of the property; and to establish that, sir, my declaration should suffice. The dignity of nations does not permit their good faith to be brought into question.

I have, therefore, upon the principle of the arrestation of the Cassius, furnished a certificate stating that she was French property, and a State vessel. This certificate is probably among the documents of the prosecution carried on by the Government of the United States, on account of the abandonment which I made to it of the Cassius, under the reservation of the right to her.

However, to comply with your desire, I have the honor to send you a second, more explicit than the former, of which you will make what use you may think proper.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect.

That the corvette le Cassius was a corvette of war belonging to the republic of France; that she was sent to him as such by General Laveaux, Governor of St. Domingo; that she was commanded by an officer of the national marine, charged with a particular mission to him, which the arrest of this corvette has interrupted; in a word, that the crew of the said corvette was composed of mariners in the service of the republic, and her marine composed of soldiers and officers of the national army.

Sir:

I duly received your letter and certificate, relative to the property of the armed vessel le Cassius being in the French republic, and have handed the same to the attorney of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, who has the affair under his management. But he desires it material, to obviate the pleas of the prosecutors, to ascertain the time when she became the property of the republic. If you have any evidence or document to ascertain this fact, I pray you will have the goodness to furnish me with it, as expeditiously as possible. The court will then have before it all the proofs requisite to govern its decision: although what this will be, whether of condemnation or acquittal, I cannot undertake to judge.

Sir:
I have to regret that the fate of the armed vessel Les Junceans, now called le Cassius, is still in suspense. I requested the Attorney of the United States, Mr. Rawle, to whom the cause had been committed, to inform me of its present situation. Before this abandonment, I complained to the Federal Executive, whom I have now the honor to enquire of.

Permit me to refer you particularly to the last paragraph of that letter, by which you will see it is plainly understood to be the sense of the court, that the regular course of legal investigation not admitting the official certificates with which you were pleased to furnish me, as conclusive proof of the property of the Cassius, will require further evidence in another form.

I am very respectfully, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

William Rawle to the Secretary of State.

May 28, 1796.

Sir:
As soon as I received the supplemental certificate of the French minister, which was not till the 26th of April, I gave notice in court that, before the session ended, I should move to have the prayer of my suggestion granted and the information dismissed.

A jury trial then before the court prevented any thing else being done until the 29th, when the counsel for the informant against the Cassius mentioned that they would, on the following day, come forward.

This was then done by requiring me to show the foundation of my suggestion.

I produced part of the correspondence between you and Mr. Adet, and the two certificates of that minister. It was urged by the informant's counsel, that the same proof was necessary to authorize receiving a suggestion as would be to support it on trial, and that as such certificates would not be received in that case, so they ought not now to be admitted.

But the court observed that much less was sufficient in one case than in the other.

A regular motion was then made by the informant's counsel, that my suggestion should be dismissed; this I declared myself ready to argue with them immediately; but as we were now at the close of the session, it appeared to the court impossible to get through the business, and it was therefore unavoidably continued till next October.

It appeared, however, so plainly to be the sense of the court that further evidence as to the property of the Cassius would be necessary on a trial of the facts, that I scarcely expect, with the aid of those two certificates only, to succeed.

I have the honor, sir, to be, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 15th Prairial, (5 June, 1796, O. S.)
4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: By abandoning the corvette le Cassius to the United States as I have done, the French republic is become absolutely unconnccted in the suit prosecuted on account of her seizure. I complained to the Federal Executive, whom I alone can and should know, against the illegal arrest of a vessel of war of the republic.

The letter written to my predecessor by the Secretary of State, on the 17th November, 1794, on the subject of the Favorite, recognized a principle, according to which I should flatter myself that you would cause this attack by a court, whose forms and authority cannot extend to the French republic, to cease.

The justice you rendered in the affair of the Favorite leads me to think that if I have not received it in the case of the Cassius, it doubtless arises from the effect of some circumstances which changed your situation; I am not to examine them, sir, and it was for that reason that, upon your refusal, I abandoned the vessel.

Now this affair is become yours, I shall give no other answer to the communication you have thought proper to make to such situation, than that a vessel of war never was navigated with any other vouchers than the captain's commission and the roll of the crew; that no other proof has ever been required for establishing the ownership.

Whether she was purchased or built on account of a State, or was taken from an enemy, or, in fine, acquired in any manner whatever, she becomes a public vessel when manned by mariners commissioned by the State.

But what I have the honor of saying to you in this respect, you, sir, as well as myself, and, notwithstanding the desire of doing what may be agreeable to you, I cannot derogate from the rights of my nation by furnishing other proofs than those which have been given—the captain's commission and my certificate, which was also supererogatory.

I notify you, sir, that the minister for Foreign Affairs has ordered me to ascertain, with you, the reparation for the injuries and damages arising from the proceedings you have ordered or permitted with respect to this corvette, but I defer treating on this point of right until I shall have received new orders from my Government, in virtue of the abandonment I made to you of this vessel, which they could not have learned until a few days after the departure of my first directions. Accept, sir, &c.

No. 105.

Case of Le Cassius.

In pursuance of the request of the Secretary of State, for the attorney for the district of Pennsylvania has the honor to return the following statement, which he hopes will be found correct.

The ship Cassius arrived at the port of Philadelphia the 4th of August, 1794, from Port de Paix, and as a public ship, the life account of her force was given to the custom house officers, agreeably to the usual practice.

On the 5th of August, Mr. James Yard, a native American citizen, and merchant of Philadelphia, filed a libel against her, in the district court of Pennsylvania, and prayed process of attachment against the vessel, and of arrest against the then

The libel stated that a schooner, called the William Lindsay, with a cargo on board, both belonging to the libellant, were captured on a voyage from the Island of St. Thomas to the city of St. Domingo, in the Island of Hispaniola, by the Cassius, under the command of Samuel B. Davis, who pretended an authority from the French republic, but really it was a citizen of the United States; that the said schooner was carried into Port de Paix, and there wonderfully detained, without compensation to the libellant; and that the Cassius had been illegally fitted out from the port of Philadelphia.

In consequence of this application the vessel was attached, and the captain arrested by the marshal.

Before the return of the process Mr. Adet wrote a letter to Mr. Randolph, then Secretary of State, (dated 29d Thermidor, 3d year of the republic, answering to the 9th of August) complaining of the detention and arrest; referring to the 15th and 19th articles of the treaty with France, and requesting the Secretary of State, 1st. To take the necessary measures to restore the captain to his liberty; and release the vessel; and, 2d. To cause the complaint to be referred to the French Government, which would repair the injury if the captain had acted without orders.

About the same time complaints were made on the part of the British resident, earnestly urging that the Cassius, having been, as alleged, illegally fitted out, should be detained, and that Government would enforce the laws against both the vessel and the captain, as an American citizen holding a commission under one of the belligerent Powers. On these opposing pretensions the attorney of the district of Pennsylvania was personally consulted by Mr. Ran- dolph. It became obviously necessary to determine, in the first place, and as speedily as possible, what the law required, before the political obligations, which might arise from the occasion, could be considered. It appeared to the American attorney, that, "if the French Government had made a fair and unsuspecting acquisition of the property of a vessel, then lying at their port, and out of the reach of the jurisdiction of the United States, a cause of forfeiture previously existing, but unknown at the time of the purchase, could not, at a future day, revive, so as to subject the same vessel, still remaining the property of a sovereign state, to the process of our courts." "Penal laws are strictly local, and affect only what they can reach." "The change of property, in a foreign country, is therefore the effect of the law, and not the condition of the individual, the right acquired by a foreign sovereign appears, on the principles of national policy, to be superior to the pre-existing right of for- reit.

The authority of another state is not amenable to the tribunals of another. What cannot be done directly ought not to be done indirectly.

Process of information and seizure indirectly brings the sovereign to submit to the tribunal, or to abandon the property. There is, indeed, little difference between the direct and indirect mode of effectuating this event, since an attachment of any movable article must be, in general, the mode of compelling the appearance of a foreign sovereign. Inconceivable evils would result from the allowance of the first experiment. An imprudent individual might, at least, endeavor to detain a whole squadron by process, which it would be impossible for the belligerent country to enforce. In respect to the charge against Captain Cassius, the district attorney was of opinion that an acceptance and exercise of a form of law within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, were necessary to constitute an offence within the act of Congress, entitled "An act in addition to the act for punishing certain crimes and offences against the United States." That, although, with the command of the Cassius, the exercise of the commission was complete, yet the acceptance of it appearing to have taken place in a foreign country, he could not be deemed liable to prosecution.

For the above opinions being verbally communicated to Mr. Randolph, produced a request on his part that the speediest method for obtaining a decision of the question should be adopted.

In the mean time some propositions for an amicable adjustment of the complaint of Mr. Yard afforded a prospect of another termination of the controversy; but, these failing, the district attorney, in obedience to his instructions, prepared a suggestion to the district court, a copy of which will be found in the annexed exemplification of the record, and which he exhibited in court on the 31st of August, where it was received and filed. This mode of proceeding being somewhat novel, may require an explanation.

The attorney for the district court, and called, as it appeared, with no very clear conception of the constitutional powers of the Executive, for a direct interposition to annul the judicial proceedings.

A claim in the name and behalf of the French nation, or a plea in the same name and behalf, to the jurisdiction of the court, would have been consistent with the technical forms of proceeding; but the district attorney had no authority to use their name; he had no warrant of attorney to produce from them if required. The United States, however, had an interest in the question; and, recurring to authorities; where the interests of third persons had been effectually brought before even courts of common law, he ventured, as a more solemn form of motion, to state to a court of admiralty and fiscal jurisdiction, the interest which he represented, and the objections he had to urge, in the form above mentioned. On the same day a plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed in the name of Samuel B. Davis, by counsel employed for him. The intention of doing this had not been communicated, or the suggestion would have been deemed unnecessary; but, so far from interfering with, they tended to support each other; both forms of the suggestion remained upon the files of the court, in course to be answered on the next court day.

In the mean time, the counsel employed for Captain Davis applied to the supreme court of the United States, then in session, for a prohibition to the district court; which was granted upon principles which will be found to coincide with those which had directed the conduct of the district attorney in the outset; a short statement of which is amply set down in the writ of prohibition; it annexed: and thus the proceedings in the district court were arrested.

court were terminated. In reviewing the case to this point, it obviously appears that the conduct of Government was inconsistent with it being satisfied that the obligations of the treaty with France were faithfully obeyed, by taking every constitutional method in aid of the requisitions of the French minister that the occasion could reasonably admit, without evasion or delay, and that nothing but the existence of a controlling power over the courts of justice, wisely excluded from our constitution, although it seems to be supposed in the complaint, could produce further objections.

The business now assumed a new aspect. On the 24th August, Mr. John Kettland, a citizen of the United States, filed an information in the circuit court, founded upon the act of 5th June, 1794, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and having made oath to the truth of his allegations, before one of the judges of the supreme court, obtained an order to attach the Cassius. It is incumbent on us to observe, that the Government of the United States had no share in this transaction. Where a forfeiture is given by law, as in the present instance, to be appropriated one-half to the informer and the other half to the public, an individual has a legal right to commence proceedings therefor, and if the proceeding be not carried on, and completed, the 1st remedy, without appeal, may be obtained, and the consequences of such failure would be a complete abandonment of the cause.

Thus it was that the suit, having been supported to the circuit court for the present proceeding. The order from the judge, the official powers of the marshals, were not to be resisted from a belief or a hope that the jurisdiction would ultimately be found incompetent.

An application on the part of the French minister to the Executive authority, to cause security to be given for the Cassius, to enable her to proceed upon her voyage, was, on consideration, rejected; because, if it should afterwards be made to appear that the ship had been illegally fitted out in a port of the United States, other nations, who might suffer by her warlike operations, would have just cause to claim a compensation from the United States, and this, independent of the ground already stated in considering the subject of forfeiture; because the request was believed to be without a precedent; and because it would, in effect, have been assuming the judicial power of determining on the important questions in view. The executive power was therefore restrained from affording further aid to the efforts of Mr. Adet, until the court should meet at Yorktown on the 11th October. On the 31st September, Mr. Adet filed a further formal application to signify to the Secretary of State that he had caused the Cassius to be dismantled, and abandoned her to the Government of the United States.

From this time, therefore, the particular motives to urgency on account of the mission with which the Cassius was said to be charged, seemed to have ceased. But the efforts to obtain a disposition of the suit were not on that account relaxed.

At the meeting of the circuit court at Yorktown, the district attorney filed a suggestion similar to that used in the district court.

The multiplicity of criminal business prevented his obtaining a decision, but it had the effect of suspending the progress of the information. The cause was necessarily continued till April session of 1796.

A letter from the district attorney to the Secretary of State, dated May 29th, 1796, relates the proceedings of that April session, which were somewhat delayed by a reluctance on the part of Mr. Adet to furnish sufficient documents to establish the property of the Cassius. A copy of the letter, as a proper continuance of the narrative, is here inserted, viz:

The trial then before the court, prevented any thing else being done until the 29th, when the informant's counsel mentioned that they would, on the following day, come forward. This was then done by requesting me to show the foundation of my suggestion. I produced part of the correspondence between you and Mr. Adet, and the two certificates from the minister. It was urged by the informant's counsel that the same proof was not sufficient to justify the receiving a suggestion as to be supported on a trial, and that, as such certificates would not be receivable in that case, so they ought not now to be received. But the court observed that much less was sufficient in one case than in the other. The accountable to the stern and judicious manner under which your commission is held to me, by the decision of May 29th, 1796, Samuel B. Davis was a lieutenant of ships in the French navy, and commander of the corvette called the Cassius, having a lawful commission; that James Yard, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, had Abridgment of the Writ of Prohibition, directed to the District Court of the United States in and for the Pennsylvania District.

The prohibition recites that, by the law of nations, and the treaties between the United States and France, the trial of prizes taken without the jurisdiction of the United States, and brought into the jurisdiction of France for adjudication, by the vessels of war of the latter, and all questions incidental to it, belong exclusively to the judiciary establishments of the latter; that consequently, its vessels of war, and their officers are not liable to process of our courts, predicated upon the support of the latter; that particularly the jurisdiction of such causes does not belong to the district courts of the United States; that for such capture and bringing into their own ports, of neutral ships, to answer for any breach of the law of nations concerning the navigation of neutrals, the said vessels of war and their officers are only accountable to the informer under whose authority their commission is held to me, by the decision of May 29th, 1796, Samuel B. Davis was a lieutenant of ships in the French navy, and commander of the corvette called the Cassius, having a lawful commission; that James Yard, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, had caused the said Davis and the said corvette to be arrested, to answer to his libel against them filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, in which he alleged that, on the said 20th of May, the said Davis, with the said corvette, and as her commander, on the high seas, a schooner belonging to the said Yard, called the William Lindsay, and carried her to Port de Paix, where she then remained; that the Cassius had been originally equipped for war in the port of Philadelphia, and that Davis, at the time of said capture, and then, was a citizen of the United States, but without alleging that the said capture had been made within a marine district of the said United States, and that the Cassius had been equipped for war in the United States, with the privity of the French republic, or by the said Davis, or that, at the time of her being so equipped, (if she ever was) she was the property of the republic, or that the said Davis was any how concerned in such equipment, and without alleging that he was retained in the service of the republic within the jurisdiction of the United States: the writ therefore prohibits the judge from further proceeding, and commands him to release said Davis and the Cassius without delay. It is tested on the 24th August, 1795.

Suggestion of the Attorney of the United States for the Pennsylvania District, and the Plea of Samuel B. Davis to the jurisdiction of the District Court for the said District.

And afterwards, to wit, on the 21st day of August aforesaid, William Rawle, Esq. attorney of the United States in and for the Pennsylvania district, who acts for the said United States in this behalf, in his proper person, comes into this court, and for the said United States gives the court to understand and be informed, that the said ship, called the Cassius, was, on the said 20th day of May, in the year aforesaid, being the time when the said libellant charged that the said schooner, William Lindsay, was taken and detained, in manner by him alleged, and also, at the time of her being arrested and attached by the marshal of the district aforesaid, at the suit of the said libellant, in respect of the property, and belonging to, the French republic, a sovereign nation, in peace, security, and alliance, with the said United States, and this he is ready, and offers to verify: wherefore the said ship, the Cassius, so being the property of, and belonging to, the French republic, cannot, by law, be rendered liable to civil process in the courts of the United States, at the suit of individuals and the said United States being answerable to foreign nations for the due observance of treaties with them subsisting, and of the principles and usages of the laws of nations in respect to ships and other property to such nations belonging, and usually seized, arrested, or attached, under color of legal process, within the territory of the said United States, and the peace and interests of the United States being deeply involved therein, the said attorney, acting in the behalf aforesaid, prays this honorable court that the said ship the Cassius, may, by the sentence and decree of this honorable court, be released and discharged from the attachment and arrest aforesaid, and that the said libel, so far as the same relates to the said ship the Cassius, may be dismissed, with such costs and damages as the court may adjudge, for her said wrongful arrest, and attachment.
And the aforesaid Samuel B. Davis, by force of the process of this honorable court, in the said court being, and not acknowledging the jurisdiction thereof, in the instance now pending, exhibits to this honorable court, with all due respect, a certificate, under the hand of citizen Adet, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, to the United States, dated the 27th Thermidor, to wit, the 9th of August, instant, certifying that the said corvette the Cassius is a vessel of war of the French republic, and that the said Samuel B. Davis is a commissioned officer in the navy of the said republic, also a commission or order of Etienne Laveaux, Governor of the island of St. Domingo, attested to be lawful and authentic, under the hand and seal of the said minister of the French republic, which said commission or order is dated the 5th of Floreal, to wit, on the 19th of February last, recorded in the registry of the French marine, at Port de Paix, the 9th Floreal, to wit, the 28th of April following, directed to him the said Samuel B. Davis, lieutenant in the navy of France, commander of the said corvette of the French republic, the Cassius, authorizing him to cruise, with the said corvette, for two months, at least, against the enemies of the French republic, and to take their ships and property on the high seas, together with true copies and translations of the said extracts, which copies and translations, being only compared with the originals now exhibited, he prays may be filed, and remain among the acts of court; whereupon, he prays, and respectfully moves this honorable court, that any thing in the libel of the said James Yard contained, notwithstanding, (he, nevertheless, not confessing, or in any wise acknowledging the same) the said corvette the Cassius and the said Samuel B. Davis may be discharged from arrest.

SIR: I have already had the pleasure to inform you, verbally, of the interest which the committee of public safety of the Sacred and Holy Republic of the United States, in due season, in the truly unhappy situation of your commerce in the Mediterranean. I now fulfill the duty imposed on me by Government, by calling to your recollection, in writing, the steps which are to be taken by our agent with the Dei of Algiers, for pressing this new manoeuvre of the British administration, which has put the finishing stroke to its proofs of malevolence towards free people. The despatch of the minister communicating this measure to me, is dated the 5th of January, and did not come to my hands till fifteen days ago; I do not yet know by what route; I could have wished it had been less tardy in coming to me, that I might sooner have fulfilled the agreeable task of proving to you, by facts, the protestations of friendship of which I have held no small share in the name of France.

The information which I shall receive from Europe, in a little time, will, doubtless, possess me of the success of those negotiations, which were to have been opened in January last. If the situation of your affairs is yet such with respect to that barbarous regency, as that our interposition may be of some utility, I pray you to invite the President in cause to be communicated to me the means that he will join to those of the committee of public safety, for the greatest success of the measures already taken. It is in virtue of the express request of the minister, that I solicit the President some communication on this subject: I shall be satisfied to be able to transmit it by a very early conveyance, which I am now preparing for France. Accept my esteem.

Sir: I herewith enclose to you a literal copy of the part of my instructions relative to a new commercial treaty, and a new consular convention, to be entered into between France and the United States. Honesty, justice, the interest of the two nations, and the most exact reciprocity, are the basis which the French republic adopts in her treaties of friendship. Be pleased to assure the President that I shall be too happy if I can contribute to tighten the bands which unite the French republic to the United States, and to assure the happiness of both.

"The minister shall prepare with the American Government the means and arrangement of a new consular convention, and of a new commercial treaty, and he shall communicate his negotiation on this subject to the committee of public safety. This negotiation shall be built upon the different decrees of the National Convention passed on this subject. The object of the new treaty shall be to found the commercial relations of the two republics upon stipulations more reciprocally advantageous, and more clearly worded than that of 1778, and the object of the consular convention to assure the full and complete execution of this treaty."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 12, 1795.

Sir: I had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday, covering an extract from your instructions relative to a new treaty of commerce, and a new consular convention. Even before we are fully informed of the extent of the different decrees of the National Convention upon which your propositions are to be founded, I do not hesitate to declare to you our readiness to open a negotiation with you upon these two subjects. It would seem from your instructions, that you have no power to conclude or sign any new compact. If I misjudge the nature of your authority, you will be pleased to correct me.

I must also beg the favor of you to communicate to me the dates of those decrees to which your instructions refer. Perhaps I may be possessed of the whole, or most of them. In that case, copies will be asked of none but those which are not in the office of this Department.

Your answer to this letter will enable me to offer to your consideration some arrangements which may facilitate the discussions.

I must, however, request, on this first opportunity of business, that when you give the dates of the French calendar, you will be so obliging as to add the dates of our own. Experience has shown that mistakes and delays have arisen in our office from the want of familiarity with the French calendar.

Sir: It is with great reluctance that I trouble you so often upon the same subject. I cannot entertain a doubt that, but for your indisposition, you would before now have answered my letter on the new negotiation, as you were obliging enough to promise me in conversation several times. But the President intending to leave this city on Tuesday morning, and it being requisite, as I have had the honor of stating to you, that I should receive his instructions before his departure, I will thank you to enable me to present to him the subject of our negotiation as fully as your overtures will permit. If I discover some anxiety, I beg you to impose it to the hope that this business will result in our mutual honor, by proving that, while we each labor for the interest of our respective nations, we can promote the prosperity of both.

P. A. Mr. Randolph will find with that letter a part of P. A. 20th Messidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me dated the 1st July. I have never doubted the attachment of the United States for the French republic, and the reply you made to my letter of the 20th June is a proof of it. You request of me, in that letter, some information, which I hasten to give you.

I neither know nor possess any other decree, relative to the new negotiation to be opened between France and the United States, than that of the 5th of February, 1793, communicated to you by citizen Genet; and, as it must be in the office of your Department, I conceive it will be useless for me to send it.

My instructions empower me to prepare the plans of a new consular convention, and of a new commercial treaty. After my Government and that of the United States shall have approved of the plans, the sending of full powers for the signature is but a formality which is easily fulfilled. This step appeared proper, to avoid a number of inconveniences at the time of the ratification of the treaty. I will fulfil the desire expressed in the last paragraph of your letter, and shall take care to add, in all my despatches, the date of your calendar to that of the French.

Accept, sir, &c.

"The minister plenipotentiary shall stipulate positively, and without reserve, the reciprocal exemption from the tonnage duty so necessary to our mercantile marine. This exemption, implicitly assured in the parts of the United States by the 4th and 5th articles of our commercial treaty, has never been executed therein, and, since the organization of their custom-house, a very burthensome tonnage duty has been rigorously exacted on our merchant vessels; even in 1792, a severity and an injustice were used, which the American Government should not have suffered. But the respective naturalization of the French and American citizens, proposed by Mr. Jefferson, and desired by the French nation, will facilitate this stipulation of a reciprocal exemption from tonnage, and render it less offensive to the Powers, who, in virtue of treaties, might claim a participation in the same advantages; as the casus federis would, by this stipulation be changed in this respect."

Sir: I understand, by the letter which I had the honor of receiving from you in the evening of yesterday, that your instructions give you power only to prepare the draught of a new consular convention, and a new treaty of commerce. Notwithstanding the formality of this procedure, the President of the United States has directed me to meet you.

But I am prevented, sir, from proposing to you a time, place, and arrangement, for our conversations, by a fear of inconveniencing you in your present indisposition. Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 16, 1795.

Sir: After acknowledging your letter of the 14th instant, which I had the honor of receiving yesterday, I take the liberty of proposing the following plan of procedure in the discussions now commencing between us.

As you are not clothed with any very formal authority upon this subject, the President of the United States has thought it proper to place me upon the same and no other footing. Hence we are both to be considered as committee, delivering our own sentiments to each other, and, after comparing them, reporting our opinions to our respective Governments; which, by these means, will remain mutually uncompromitted, until the system is modified so as to meet their approbation.

So various and weighty is the business which now presses upon my attention, that I could not rely upon my own memory, nor upon my own accuracy, were not the interchange of our thoughts to be made on paper. I beg leave, therefore, to suggest, that we conduct the discussion in this way, except when it shall appear to either of us more expedient to have an interview on some particular difficulty. Our letters shall constitute no part of a formal report to our Governments; and shall be liable to be recalled, or changed, as each party pleases; unless, on the close of the transaction, we shall agree to annex them to any draught which may be prepared.

Assuring you, then, that no unnecessary procrastination shall be found in me, I submit to your consideration this arrangement: 1st. That you state the parts of the subsisting treaty which you wish to be abolished; 2d. Those parts which you wish to be corrected; and 3d. Any additions which seem to you desirable. These may be examined, either separately or conjointly, as shall be most agreeable to you, and, if you prefer stating one class at a time, I shall not object. Indeed, if any other arrangement shall strike you more favorably, I have too little predilection for my own to hesitate at the adoption of a better.

This transaction is so momentous that too much time cannot be well spent upon it; and it will facilitate my other duties, could I enter into it so early as to afford full opportunity for reflection.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

SIR: On the 6th, I received the letter of that date, which you addressed to me in answer to the observations I made to you on the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain. I have only to observe, that my health, which has always been unstable since my arrival in this country, obliged me to abstain from business for upwards fifteen days. I shall transmit it to the French Government, together with my observations and the treaty. In such important circumstances, it is exclusively the province of my Government to judge, and I cannot permit myself to decide at all.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 26th Messidor, (14th July, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you an official decree of the committee of public safety of the 14th Nivose, in the 3d year of the French republic, which you have seen in the newspapers, and which you communicated to my predecessor, citizen Fauchet, in your letter of the 14th of last Nivose.

The decree revokes the 9th article of that of 25th Brumaire, in the same year, a copy of which I have also the honor to transmit to you.

You will see, sir, in both, the undisguised disposition and sincere desire of the French Government religiously to observe the engagements it has contracted with its allies, and its readiness to redress infractions which have never taken place but from the impulse of circumstances.

That of the 14th Nivose will convince you particularly of the purity of motives and respect for principles which animate the National Convention and its committees. It was not produced by representations from the neutral Governments or their subjects, but the result of a rigid examination of the extant or former contracts with our allies.

By this article, the merchandises belonging to Powers at enmity with the French republic, laden on board of neutral vessels, are declared free.

It is amidst her triumphs that the republic loves to give this striking mark of her fidelity. Victorious France knows no other concern than that of justice—no other diplomatic language than that of truth.

As for myself, sir, who have the honor of representing her near your Government, I esteem myself happy in having the superintendence of the execution of these measures of justice; and if, contrary to my expectation, they should experience any violations by the vessels which come near your harbors, you will see me anticipate your complaints by honestly probing them to the bottom, and redressing them with a zeal equal to that with which you might be animated yourself.

Accept, sir, &c. P. A. ADET.

No. 121.

Extract from the Register of the Decrees of the Committee of Public Safety of the National Convention, of the 14th Nivose, 3d year of the French republic one and indivisible.

The committee of public safety, considering that the 33d article of the treaty of commerce between France and the United States of America, of the 6th of February, 1778, stipulates formally—

1st. That the French and Americans may navigate in full security with their vessels, without any exception being made on account of the proprietor of the merchandises laden in those vessels, from whatever port or place they come, and although the Power for which they are destined, is, or may be, an enemy of the contracting nations; that they may, in like manner, navigate in full security with their vessels and merchandises, and frequent the places, ports, and harbors, of Powers, enemies of the two contracting nations, or of one of them, and carry on commerce not only from an enemy's to a neutral port, but from one neutral port to another:

2d. That free vessels shall make free goods; and every thing which shall be found on board of vessels belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting nations, shall be judged free, if even the lading should belong in whole, or in part, to the enemies of either; contraband articles being always excepted:

3d. That this same freedom shall be extended to the persons who may be on board of the free vessels, should they even be enemies of one of the two contracting nations; and that consequently those persons cannot be taken from on board of such vessels, unless they be military characters and actually in the service of the enemy: Considering that the crimes of England have given to the war of desolation against liberty a character of injustice and atrocity unexampled in history, the National Convention found itself obliged, in using the right of reprisal, to decree, on the 9th of May, 1793, that vessels of war and privateers should arrest, and conduct into the ports of the republic, the neutral vessels which should be found laden, in whole or in part, either with produce belonging to neutral nations, and destined for enemies' ports, or with merchandises the property of enemies; but that, soon after, on the 1st of July, 1793, the National Convention hastened to re-establish, in all their vigor, the dispositions above recited of the treaty, of the 6th of February, 1778; that in fact it has been revoked by that of the 27th of the same month, so far as relates to the produce and merchandises belonging to any enemy; that thus it has respected, and will always respect, the property of neutral Powers, with regard to which the French Government have not to blush for having delayed to show it justice and honesty, until the cabinet of London revoked, as they have done, a considerable time after, the order issued by them during the preceding year, for seizing every neutral vessel carrying produce or merchandises of neutral nations to France;

Considering that since, and notwithstanding the aforesaid with which that cabinet continues daily to insult the rights of nations, and to violate the neutrality of non-belligerent Powers, in causing to be seized their vessels laden with merchandises destined for France, the National Convention enjoined, by the 7th article of the law of the 13th of this month, all the agents of the republic, all the commandants of the armed forces, and all officers, civil and military, to cause to be respected and observed, in every particular, the treaties uniting France to the neutral Powers of the ancient continent, and to the United States; that, by the same article, an infringement of those treaties is forbidden, and that all acts which may be contrary thereto are annulled;

Considering that it is of importance to make known to the world this grand act of honesty and justice, and speedily to do away every pretext which malevolence might employ, either for obstructing or retarding its effect, or perverting the same to the prejudice of the republic, it is decreed:
ART. 1. The colonial and marine commissioners shall notify, without delay, all the commandants of the naval armies, divisions, squadrons, fleets, or vessels, of the article of the law of the 15th of this month, cited above; and inform them, in the sequel, that they must not receive, and of no effect, the disposition of the fifth article of the decree of the committee of public safety, of finances, and of commerce and supplies, of the 29th Brumaire, (15th November) which authorized the seizure of merchandises belonging to enemy Powers, until they should have decreed, or other lawful measures been taken, the documents laden on board of neutral vessels.

ART. 2. Merchandises, even of neutral nations, denominated contraband, or prohibited, shall continue to be liable to seizure.

ART. 3. The articles comprised under the name of prohibited or contraband merchandises, are arms, instruments, and warlike effects of whatever kind they may be, horses, and their harness, and all kinds of effects, produce, or merchandises, destined for an enemy's port, actually besieged, blockaded, or invested.

ART. 4. The commissioners for exterior relations shall transmit the present decree to the agents of the republic near the allied or neutral Governments, with orders to communicate it to them.

ART. 5. The present decree shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of the Department of War of the United States, charged with the Department of State.

PHILADELPHIA, the 7th Vendémiaire, (28th Sept. 1795, O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: The public papers announce, in every quarter, that the English, in contempt of the law of nations, arrest and seize American vessels laden with provisions for the ports of France. Although this fact is not authentically voucheded to me yet I cannot doubt it, since no one has ever contradicted any of the numerous assertions which had any relation to it.

If the interests of my country were not deeply compromitted by the measures which the English Government has taken with regard to your commerce, I should have remained silent. I know that it is not for me to judge of circumstances in which the glory of the United States, the honor of their flag, the liberty of their commerce, may be outraged. I know, therefore, that it is the province of their Government alone to decide and to act, and that that Government would justly have reason to be hurt at the representations of a foreign minister, from his information and the nature of things, on an object which interested the American nation, or its Government alone; but, sir, if it is the object of the Ministers of the United States in question, those of France are also, and I should betray my duty if I were for a moment to forget them.

It is not the first time that the English have given to the world the scandalous spectacle of their contempt for the rights of nations. It is not the first time that the American Government has had occasion to complain, and has been apprehensive of seeing their neutrality compromitted. So long ago as 1793, the cabinet of St. James ordered the arrestation and seizure of American vessels laden for the ports of France. This conduct, which violated every principle, and which injured the interests of the republic, obliged the convention to imitate it: but its views were very different from those of the British Government, as, by that means, she sought to support, though indirectly, the rights of neutral nations; she ought to be entirely justified by the 5th article of the decree, declaring, that it shall cease to have effect when the combined Powers shall have acknowledged, agreeably to the law of nations, provisions found on board of neutral vessels, as not liable to seizure. Although the Coalition Powers are far from admitting these principles, sacred to every honest Government, the National Convention has not thought proper longer to follow their example, and the committee of public safety has exhibited in its arrest of the fourteenth last Nivose, its love for justice, and the sentiments of France for the United States.

You know, sir, as well as I do, that the war which exists between two Powers, cannot alter, in any manner, the rights of the United States, who wish to remain at peace; and that their relations with those belligerent Powers are the same as before the declaration of war. These conditions constitute the state of neutrality. As soon as the relations change—when one of the belligerent Powers is more favored than another by the State which has not taken part in the war, the neutrality of that State ceases to exist. If, therefore, one of the belligerent States seeks to obtain from the neutral nation an advantage not enjoyed by its enemy, the neutral State should, if she wish to remain at peace, oppose its pretensions by all the means in her power, or she should, in order to keep, the balance in equilibriun between both enemies, allow them to participate in the same advantages, if her interests permit; otherwise that nation would discover a partiality which cannot accord with the state of neutrality. These are evident truths, and are generally received.

Besides, in every war, neutral nations have armed in defence of their neutrality; and we accordingly see, at the present moment of affairs, that Denmark have been in the practice of protecting their commerce and supporting their neutrality; likewise did the United States in 1793, strongly complain against the arrestation of their vessels by the ships of war of the English. Permit me, sir, to cite here, in support of this assertion, the following lines from a letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Puckleck, dated the 7th September, 1793.

"This act, too, tends directly to draw us from the state of peace, in which we are wishing to remain. It is an essential character of neutrality, to furnish no aids (not stipulated by treaty) to one party, which we are not equally ready to furnish to the other. If we permit corn to be sent to Great Britain and her friends, we are equally bound to permit it to France. To restrain it, would be a partiality which might lead to war with France, and between restraining it ourselves, and permitting her enemies to restrain it unrightfully, is no difference. She would consider this a mere pretext, of which she would not be the dupe, and on what honorable ground could we otherwise explain it? Thus we should see ourselves plunged, by this unauthorized act of Great Britain, into a war, with which we meddle not, and which we wish to avoid, if justice to all parties, and from all parties, will enable us to avoid it. In the case, where we found ourselves obliged, by treaty, to withhold from the enemies of France the right of arming in our ports, we thought ourselves in justice bound to withhold the same right from France also, and we did it. Were we to withhold from her, supplies of provisions, we should, in like manner, be bound to withhold them from her enemies also, and thus shut to ourselves all the ports of Europe, where corn is in demand, or make ourselves parties in the war. This is a dilemma, which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may, indeed, feel the desire of starving an enemy nation; but she can have no right of doing it at our loss, nor of making us the instrument of it.

This quotation I conceive is the development of the principles which we have laid down; and when it contains the sentiments and opinion of the American Government itself, it would be unnecessary to enter into an ulterior discussion.

It cannot now, therefore, be doubted by any man, who will discard prejudices, love, hatred, and, in a word, all the passions which lead the judgment astray, that the French republic have a right to complain, if the American Government suffer the English to interrupt the commercial relations which exist between her and the United States: if, by a perfidious condensation, it permitted the English to violate a right which it ought to defend for its honor and its interest: if, under the cloak of neutrality, it presented to England a poniard to cut the throat of its faithful ally: if, in fine, participating in the tyrannic and homicidal rage of Great Britain, it concurred to plunge the French people into the horrors of famine.

But I am convinced this will not be the case. The American Government is too much attached to the laws of an exact neutrality it knows too well that the cause of freemen is interwoven with that of France, to allow the English to usurp a right injurious to the interests of the republic.

It is under this conviction that I have written to you this letter, persuaded that it is perhaps superfluous to address to you these reclamation. I do not doubt but that the American Government will prove to all Europe its intention of maintaining the most exact neutrality with regard to the belligerent Powers; that it will compel England no longer to violate the rights of nations; and that it will henceforward relieve France from the unpleasantness of addressing new complaints on this subject.

Accept, sir, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, 9th Germinal, (March 29, 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

On the 7th Vendémiaire last, I had the honor of writing to you, relative to the arrest of American vessels laden with provisions for France. I flattered myself with receiving from you an answer which might prove to my Government that the United States, faithful to the neutrality which they have imposed on themselves, neglect no means of repressing every infringement made on it by any of the belligerent parties to the detriment of its enemy.

Near six months ago, I sent a copy of my representation to my Government, and at the expiration of that term I was under the necessity of informing it that I still expected a solution of this important object.

Now, sir, I complain upon a point infinitely more essential, and which does not to me appear susceptible of delay: I mean the impressments exercised by the English on board of American vessels.

For some time, each successive vessel arriving from the colonies brings, in this respect, more frightful accounts than the former, and I have just received from the vice consul at Alexandria, a letter of the 4th Germinal, relative to the impressment used by the English ship Swan, and the frigate Success, upon the crew of the brig Fair Columbian, from Alexandria, freighted, on account of the English, by Messrs. Patterson and Taylor.

It is not then sufficient for the English to purchase a number of vessels, which they load with all sorts of provisions; to navigate their vessels under your flag; to carry horses for remounting the cavalry; to enrol grooms for this military service; that they must also take by force the American crews, in order to make them serve on board their vessels of war, to the ruin of our colonies.

You must be sensible, sir, that simple and ordinary measures are insufficient in such circumstances. We have neither the right nor desire of interfering in your interior administration, but, when hostilities are in question, France may request an account of the measures you have taken for putting a stop to them, and repairing the damage they already have caused, or may hereafter do.

Permit me, sir, to repeat to you, they should be prompt and efficacious. Would representations to the court of London, which, in the course of six months, perhaps, might put a stop to these odious attacks, if, at the end of that time they are no longer necessary, be sufficient in the existing circumstances?

The English division in the colonies is entirely recruited by mariners taken from on board your vessels. It is by their means that they block up the republican ports; it is to their succor we ought to attribute the loss of these immense possessions, if the American Government should not take the step which the duty of neutrality dictates to it.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect.

FRANCE.

The vice consul at Alexandria announces to me the return of Messrs. Evellits and Scammam, captains of the schooners Chloe Anne and Industry, whose entire crews have been impressed at the Mule.

Two vessels, purchased by Mr. Cavan, are still in that port, and recent orders have been given to him for expediting fifty more.

Mr. Kenna, captain of the schooner Free Mason, is also arrived from Martiniqne, where he left twenty vessels, whose crews, as well as his own, have been forcibly carried off.

I did not add a single reflection to my former letter.

Mr. Henry Alexander, of Baltimore, in whose favor you requested my intervention with General Rigaud, informs me, by a letter this moment received, that he is restored to the affections of his family.

Accept, sir, the expression of my respect.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States, PHILADELPHIA, 22 Nov. 1796, O. S. 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

Letters from the French consuls at Baltimore, Norfolk, and Alexandria, announce to me that the English have purchased a great quantity of flour in Maryland and Virginia, and that they have laden it on board American vessels, which they have likewise purchased. This flour is destined to support the English army directed against the French colonies. It is not without the most severe chagrin that I have observed the enemies of my country drawing from yours means of subsistence, without which they must have renounced every species of attempt, and that I have found myself incapable of preventing them. Indeed, who could arrest the exportation of this flour, if not the Government of the United States? And, if I had solicited it of them, could I have calculated upon their complying-five vessels purchased, when they would have considered that descendancy rather as a favor than as a duty rising out of their neutrality? But, sir, there is another circumstance, upon which the letters from the consuls leave me in doubt, and to which the laws which the American Government have prescribed to itself for its neutrality, oblige it to pay particular attention. The vessels purchased, the cargoes committed in the hands of innocent men. If your follow-citizens are prohibited from serving in the cause of France, neither should they be permitted to range themselves under the British flag: otherwise the neutrality would only be a vain term, and a certain mean of assisting secretly, and without running any risk, a power which no one would dare to aid openly.

There is also another object, sir, upon which I should fix your attention. The consuls at Norfolk informs me, that the English have caused to be purchased a great number of horses, in Virginia, and that even stables are established, near Norfolk, for receiving them. These horses are destined for the English cavalry, to be debarked at St. Domingo, to attempt the conquest, and to endeavor to bring about the ruin, of that place. If France be interested in frustrating these projects, should not the United States also, perhaps, under certain relations, prevent the execution of them? Besides, their neutrality imposes on them the obligation of arresting the exportation of horses, which constitute the principal force of the English army. The horses are contraband of war: you are sensible of this, sir, and no contraband of war can be furnished to a Power at war, without the other Power having the right of opposing it in any manner whatever. [So says Vattel, vol. 2, book 3, chapter 7, § 113, Amsterdam edition, 1775.]

"The nation which makes war, has the greatest interest in depriving its enemy of every foreign assistance, and, therefore, has a right to regard, if not absolutely as enemies, at least as people who care very little about injuring them, those who carry to their enemy the thing which they require for war; they punish them by confiscating their merchandise. If the sovereign of the latter should undertake to protect them, it would seem as though he himself wished to furnish this kind of succor; a step contrary to neutrality."

It is therefore evident, sir, from this passage, that no neutral Government can protect contraband of war. But would not the American Government protect it? If it would permit to be exported from its territory, horses destined for the English army? Indeed, sir, if, after being informed of the designs of the English, it could stop the exportation of the horses, which they have purchased, and did not do it, it is evident that the omission would constitute a proof of its consent and approbation. And what difference is there in this case between tolerating contraband and protecting it?

It is useless, sir, to spin out this letter any further. I think that the facts are so self evident that I now flatten myself with receiving a proof of that friendship of which the United States have so often given assurances to the republic.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my esteem.

No. 128.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 20, 1796.

Sir:

On the 15th I received your letter of the 12th instant, and laid the same before the President of the United States.

The principle of an impartial neutrality, and the established practice, agreeably to the laws of nations, furnish answers on the subjects you have been pleased to bring into view.

You admit that, with respect to the flour which the "English have purchased in Maryland and Virginia," it would be an act of "courtesy" in the American Government to forbid its exportation. But such courtesy, you must be sensible, would violate our duty as a neutral Power, and, of course, it cannot be rendered to the purchase and exportation of flour to the dominions of the French republic having been, during the whole of the present war, perfectly free.

You also represent that the English are purchasing horses in Virginia, "and horses are contraband of war." That horses are contraband will not be questioned; but your position, "that what is thus contraband cannot be furnished to one of the Powers at war, without giving the other the right of opposing it in any manner whatever," cannot be admitted. If the subjects of a neutral Power export contraband goods, the passage you have cited from Vattel shows what kind of opposition may be given to it: the neutral exporters may be "punished by the confiscation of their merchandise," if taken at sea, by the belligerent Power against whom it is destined to be used. But the same chapter in that book informs us, that all the Powers at war have a right to resort to a neutral country "to purchase provisions, horses, and in general whatever they stand in need." Horses have always been a considerable article in the commerce of this country; and in the same book we find the following passage: "If a nation trades in arms, timber, ships, military stores, &c. I cannot take it amiss that it sells such things to my enemy, provided that it does not refuse to sell them to me also." The justice of this doctrine is indisputable, and has, moreover, been explicitly assented to by one of your predecessors.

Mr. Hammond, the late British minister in the United States, had represented "that arms and military accoutrements were buying up by a French agent in this country, with an intent to export them to France." To this it was answered, on the part of the United States, "that our citizens have always been free to make, vend, and export arms; that it is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle, and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, has not required from them such an internal derangement in their occupations. It is satisfied with the external penalty pronounced in the President’s proclamation, that of confiscation of such portion of these arms as shall fall into the hands of the belligerent Powers on their way to the ports of their enemies. Should you then see the letter’s second article of 22d of March, 1792. The letter was delivered by Mr. Ternant to Mr. Genet, whose answer to Mr. Jefferson, on the 27th of the same month, contains this expression: “I have no knowledge of the purchase of the arms in question, and, at all events, the reply you have made to Mr. Hammond would convince him of the nullity of his observations.”

But I have stated to you already, and have occasioned the delay in answering your letter. You inform that the flour, purchased by the English in Maryland and Virginia, is laden on board American vessels which they have purchased, and that these vessels are manned by American masters and sailors; and observe, “that if our citizens are forbidden to serve the cause of France, they ought not to range themselves under the flag of a Power against which we have declared war.” British practice, therefore, will allow me to proceed further in stating our rights and duties in relation to the belligerent Powers; from which I trust it will appear that the interference of the American Government in any of the cases mentioned in your letter would be very improper.

So far as selling and carrying supplies of provisions and goods of all kinds to France and her dominions can be viewed as serving its cause, our citizens have been, and continue free to sell and transport them. They have never been forbidden to do this. They have merely been admonished, by the proclamation of the President, that if of any of these goods should be of the kind deemed contraband, and, as such, should be seized and confiscated, they would not receive the protection of the United States. But this rule is not confined to France. It is to be observed towards all the belligerent Powers; because towards all the American Government determined to observe an exact neutrality.

In the same proclamation, the citizens of the United States were cautioned against committing, aiding, orabetting hostilities against any of the Powers at war; and informed that if any of them, by doing those things, rendered themselves liable to punishment under the law of nations, the United States would not protect them. Since that time, the Legislature of the United States have enacted a law which forbids any citizen of the United States, importing and exercising, within their jurisdiction, “a commission to serve a foreign prince or state in war, by land or sea,” or to “enlist, or enter himself in the service of any foreign prince or state as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer,” under the penalty of fine and imprisonment.

The law of war, therefore, is a law relative to the belligerent Powers. And herein it was, doubtless, the intention of the Legislature to conform to the rules of the law of nations, imposing adequate penalties for the violations of those rules, but prescribing no new restraints.

Hence I conclude that it is not unlawful for the citizens of the United States to sell or hire their uninsured vessels to any of the Powers at war; or to sell or hire their insured vessels to such Powers as are in violation of the rules of war.

From the laws of nations, and of the United States, permit me to pass to the subsisting treaty of amity and commerce between France and the United States; it will, if I mistake not, throw much light on the questions you have raised. It is not of any doubt, that the treaty contains several provisions to the above extent.

By the 23d article of the treaty the two Powers agreed that it should be lawful for the people of both countries “to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who were, or thereafter should be, at enmity with either.” It was also stipulated, that French ships and freights, and that every thing should be deemed free which should be found on board the ships belonging to either of the contracting parties, although the whole, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also alleged, that the same liberty should be extended to persons who should be found on board the French ships; when although they should be enemies to either party, they are not taken out of the ship, unless they are soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemy.

The 12th and 13th articles of the treaty particularly contemplate the case that the vessels of each of the contracting parties will take on board contraband goods to transport to the enemies of the other, and regulate the proceedings thereon. The contraband goods, if discovered, may be taken and confiscated, “but the ship itself, as well as any other goods found therein, are to be esteemed free.” And we have seen above, that the 23d article makes provision for the case where the vessels of either party should be employed in transporting the enemies of the other, and remain under circumstances as if they were soldiers in the actual service of the enemy. But it is plain that the vessels themselves are to remain free.

With respect to any marine service of the people of the two contracting parties, if we recur to the 21st article of the treaty, we are told that it imposes no restraint but these “that they shall not apply for, or take, any commission or letters of marque for arming any ship or ships to act as privateers, contrary to the law.”

Practice has corresponded with these rules. Independent of the very numerous exports in single vessels, from this country, of every article it could furnish, useful to France and its dominions, two fleets, of which American vessels formed a part, sailed from the United States for France, under convoy of French men-of-war; the American vessels thus ranging themselves (if you please) under the flag of France. And can we now, as an impartial neutral nation, deny the same to the British? But will it be said that our sailors manned only our own vessels? Without supposing that none of them served on board armed French vessels, permit me to ask, what is the difference between the citizens of a neutral nation hiring their unarmed vessels, with their crews, to transport provisions and stores for one of the Powers at war, and selling, and then manning the same vessels, for the same service? I do not discover any; and until a distinction can be manifestly shown, I shall conclude that, whatever consequences may result from the measure, which are the subject of your letter, these measures the Government of the United States have no right to restrain.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 129.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 21 Fontose, the 11th March, 1796. (O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

I have duly read the answer you were pleased to make to the letter of the 22d of November last. I have till now deferred presenting additional claims to those of which I have the honor to address you, because, from the arrest of the slop Diana, by order of the Governor of Virginia, I conceived that a new examination of the question had been determined upon, a course entirely opposed to your first resolutions; but since it is otherwise, that the American Government has, to my knowledge, refused to adopt the Government of France in their treatment of neutral vessels. The English have laden with horses, and other goods, in Connecticut and Massachusetts the purchase of horses which they have made in those States; since the year also disposed to export these horses in vessels purchased in your ports, and navigated by American captains and sailors, you will permit me, sir, to renew my solicitations with the Government of the United States, to induce it to take those measures which, in these circumstances, its duty and neutrality dictate. You must recollect, that, in my letter of the 22d November, I called your attention to two questions.

1. Should the Government of the United States, in conformity with its neutrality, prevent the exportation Of an article contraband of war, purchased by the enemies of France? 2. Can that Government, without compromising its neutrality, permit its citizens to purchase vessels of war from the United States for the purpose of shipment to France? I must, therefore, destroy the reasons which led me to believe that these questions, according to the law of neutrality, should be determined in favor of the republic. I flattered myself that your knowledge, and the attachment of the Government of the United States to our cause, would supply any deficiency occasioned by the want of any arguments which it appears to me that I did not explain myself in a manner sufficiently precise in order to realize my expectation.

Therefore, I shall enter into a new discussion of the questions which I presented to you in answering the different passages of your letter.

Your views that the United States should oppose the exportation of horses purchased by the English, I cited the paragraph 113, chap. 7, book 3, of Vattel, I was aware of the paragraph 110, which precedes it, and which you oppose to my quotation; but I must observe to you that this paragraph has not the least connexion with article 113, which relates to the contraband of war. Consequently, therefore, destroy the reason which makes me suspect that it is the 113th paragraph, which is subsequent to it. If it were otherwise, if Vattel should be found to contradict himself, in as clear a manner as might be supposed from your observations, we should not, in future, bring this author to our support. But, besides, the matter in question at present does not relate to citizens or subjects of a neutral nation, but to their property, and to their right of removing contraband to confiscation, but several agents of a Government in enmity with France, who, coming here, as to one of their provinces, purchase horses and collect them in stables prepared by themselves, put them on board of vessels purchased in this country, and export them with as much security as if they were drawing them from their other-tery. If you wish for safety, I shall advise that French citizens shall traffic in this contraband of war.

"Your Government is to punish them if it can, by confiscating their vessels," I should ask, sir, against whom should my Government act when it cannot seize this contraband which is carried on under the eye of the Government of the United States? For it would be a cruel error, says Galliani, to think that a belligerent Power has no other basis, so to speak, to the enforcement of its laws than the submission of the neutral Government. 2. When a belligerent nation wishes a neutral and friendly people not to carry contraband of war to its enemy, she should formally, and in a very explicit manner, notify the neutral Government of her intention; she should not do it, the neutral nation has a right to regard her silence as an assent to the continuation of her ordinary commercial regulations.

When a belligerent State makes such a declaration, it of course follows that it renounces the right to ask of a neutral people contraband merchandise, the exportation of which it desires to be prohibited to the enemy; and, consequently, it ought, in the name of this country an impartial observer, to renounce, in the name of this country, the right of granting to contraband of war? Can it be supposed that such a step would be contrary to the laws of neutrality? No, sir; for if a nation confines itself within the limits of neutrality, by granting the same advantages to the belligerent parties, it creates thereby a barrier to the exercise of those privileges which it itself has the right to exercise. I hope the honor of citing you, will support this opinion. 3. When a belligerent nation wishes a neutral and friendly people not to carry contraband of war to its enemy, she should formally, and in a very explicit manner, notify the neutral Government of her intention; she should not do it, the neutral nation has a right to regard her silence as an assent to the continuation of her ordinary commercial regulations.

Besides, sir, were all people to prefer their commercial interests to the principles of neutrality, which I have developed, should that be a reason for the United States to imitate them, when France and her enemies are in questi on of war? When the English seized your neutral vessels, it caused them to be seized in like manner; but as I mentioned to you in my letter of the 1st of September, 1795, which remains unanswered, it was not from the same motive. No, sir, it was not from a spirit of commerce; and therefore, however, did she not follow the example of nations? Did she not revoke the orders which had been given? Are not the decrees of the 25th Brumaire and 14th Nivose, in the 3d year, which I sent you with my letter of the 26th Messidor, evident proofs of it? When, in the course of last summer, Great Britain again caused your vessels to be arrested, to prevent their carrying grain to France, did they not allow you to do so? Has not the French nation sufficiently redressed the flag, even to the injury of her own interests? But if the amicable relations of two people are reciprocal, why, at this time, should you refuse to acknowledge the fidelity of France, by an act equally faithful? especially when that act would not compromise your interests, and would be conformable to the laws of neutrality, and, in certain respects, to the understanding of treaties. It is with a sincere respect of Governments as with that of individuals—it is not by words but by actions that friendship and attachment are proved.

I have proved to you, sir, as I cannot doubt, from all I have said, that it comports with the laws of neutrality, with your relations as to the belligerent Powers, to stop the exportation of the articles which the English draw from you, the request I have made in this respect was founded; and I conclude upon the first question that the Govern ment of the United States should, agreeable to the laws of neutrality, arrest the exportation of an article contraband of war purchased by the enemies of France.

Having answered the question which form the subject of this letter, I pass to the second.

It is conceived in these terms. Can the Government of the United States, without compromising its neutrality, permit its citizens to serve on board of vessels belonging to the enemies of France?

This question relates to the maneuvers practised by the English in Virginia, and which they are still carrying on in the Ohio. What conduct should the United States adopt towards America's enemies and sailors. It is to this conduct of the English that this phrase of my letter of 29 Nivose relates. "If your citizens are not to serve the cause of France, they should not range themselves under the flag of Great Britain." I conceived it had a meaning sufficiently precise at that time, and I consider it as still precise. It was not in the first, to apply to your citizens, with regard to France and England; that is to say, that they should not serve in the military operations of the two nations. But I have still had the misfortune of being deceived on this head, and I shall enter into new explanations on the subject.

You are so firmly convinced that, of nations, and to those of the United States, your citizens cannot enrol themselves in the service of any foreign Prince or State; that is to say, that your citizens cannot aid in any manner the military operations of any foreign Prince or Power; but can the military operations of a foreign Prince or Power be aided only in the above mentioned characters? You think so, sir; I venture to hope that you will permit us to extend the same considerations to your citizens, just as far as they are not received from one place to another, without serving in the war? Do not the transports filled with troops and ammunition, sailing with and debarking under the protection of a fleet, form a part of that fleet? Are they not necessary means to the success of the projected operation? And are the captains and sailors of the English vessels, which transport the horses, ammunition, and provisions necessary to the success of the expedition; that they do not aid its operations. No, sir, such an assertion can never be fairly advanced; it would be to torture words, and to fall into puerile distinctions, which should never be met with in free and faithful discussions.

I think, sir, that, these principles being admitted, you will readily conceive that, if the laws of the United States and our treaties are silent on the circumstance just cited; that, if it has not been foreseen and explicitly declared convers to neutrality, it is not the less so in itself, and should be prevented by every nation who wishes to preserve her neutrality.

But, sir, are not the American vessels purchased by the English become, by the very act of sale, English property? Although you found no difference members of a neutral nation hiring their unarmed vessels, with their crews, to transport provisions and stores for one of the Powers at war, and selling, and then manning the same vessels for the same service,"

Still, however, there will exist between the two cases the following distinction:

In the first, your fellow-citizens man American vessels; in doing this, they use the right appertaining to them, and having in their power these advantages, in the second, they are not in the service of a foreign Prince, or a Power, as they are in the first; in the same manner, they enrol themselves under the American flag, and by American captains and sailors, and which have no right to your protection, since they are enemy's property. For you know, sir, that, in order to acknowledge an armament as belonging to a nation, the vessel and two-thirds of the crew must belong to that nation, and be manned by its subjects. And because they are not on board of ships of war, it may be said they are not in the service of the belligerent Power; that they do not aid its operations. No, sir, such an assertion can never be fairly advanced; it would be to torture words, and to fall into puerile distinctions, which should never be met with in free and faithful discussions.

What I have said is, conceive, sufficient to prove that the United States should not permit their citizens to man any English vessel whatever; but it is necessary that I should answer some of the observations you have advanced in support of a contrary opinion.

I need not make any remark on the distinction you admit between an armed and an unarmed vessel. It is, I con crude, destroyed by the reasoning presented to you; but I should call your attention to the identity you wish to estab de a vessel, which is a subject of my complaint; and therefore, as you state the case, if your citizens, having enrolled themselves under the French flag, could not be prevented from putting themselves under that of Great Britain. But, sir, how do you find an analogy in two cases which are dissimilar? Be pleased to recollect that the vessels which sailed from your ports under the French flag, were merely laden with British ships of war, and which were not committed, and did not in any manner, compromise her neutrality? and is not this the case now that your citizens are serving on board of English vessels?

What I have said is, conceive, sufficient to prove that the United States should not permit their citizens to man any English vessel whatever; but it is necessary that I should answer some of the observations you have advanced in support of a contrary opinion.

to neutral nations. By your supposition, therefore, one might be supported in tolerating an infraction of the neutrality of the United States.

I conceive, sir, that having proved to you that American vessels purchased by the English, being English property, you have no right to refuse to receive on board of them, I may conclude that the United States cannot, without compromising their neutrality, permit their citizens to serve the enemies of France.

I shall not make any reflection upon the last sentence of your answer. "I shall consider that whatever consequences shall follow in the cases which are the subjects of your letter, these measures the Government of the United States have no right to restrain."

It is the province of my Government, to which I shall send your letter, to explain and to draw the consequences resulting from it.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my esteem.

No. 130.

The Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 22, 1796.

Sir:

I intended long since to have returned an answer to your letter of the 11th of March, in which you renew your objections to the purchase and exportation of horses by the British from the United States. It was some time before it was in my power to consider my remarks, and examine the authority of Galliani, which you quoted; but that consideration and examination convinced me that the line of conduct which the Government of the United States had prescribed to itself was that which it ought still to pursue. I considered the right of the citizens of the United States to sell and export contraband goods to any of the belligerent Powers as incontrovertibly established; and I am of opinion that your present demand was based upon a demonstration of this right, you have passed over in silence, and recurred to the authorities of Vattel and Galliani, especially of the latter, on the rights and duties of neutral powers. These authorities, however, appear to me as little to support your claim to the article of commercial arms as the commercial articles of the commercial nations. Referring to Vattel, book 2, ch. 11 (the subject of which entire chapter is to delineate the rights and duties of neutrality) your first remark is, that the 113th section, which you quoted, has no relation to the 110th, cited by me. But permit me to observe, that it would be a novel mode of interpreting an author to take up a single paragraph, and thus interprete it, on the same subject, as well as to take up the whole discourse, and thenceforward (as the same author says elsewhere) "we ought to consider the whole discourse together, in order perfectly to conceive the sense of it." (L. 2, ch. 17, § 285.) In both the sections cited, (110 and 113) the rights of neutrals to trade in articles contraband of war is clearly established: in the first, by selling to the warring Powers, who come to the neutral to buy them; in the second, by the neutral subjects or citizens carrying to them the countries of the Powers at war, and there selling them.

The same just rule of interpretation applied to the discourse of Galliani, on this subject, will exhibit a result not less plausible. I shall subjoin a passage from the 4th section of the same chapter of his book which you have cited: "I repeat it, then, once for all, that neutral nations must observe the most conscientious sincerity, as well in refraining from the sale of contraband of war as from all exportation of it, except only in the cases I have above spoken of; for a recurrence to these exceptions, and to the other observations of this writer, will show that his doctrine does not reason on this subject. I shall content myself with quoting a few of his remarks.

Book 1, ch. 9, § 3. "More, however, is the number of those who believed that every belligerent Power possesses essentially the right of forbidding neutral Powers to sell arms and warlike stores to its enemy; and that this is a full right, that is, a right of strict justice. They do not distinguish the circumstance, when the neutral Powers carry on trade with one of the belligerents, and supply it with arms and warlike stores, and when, with perfect impartiality, they trade with both. In the first case, the preference of one party is apparent, and a right is inferred to possession; in the second, a neutrality is in question, and the neutral has a right to it at an end; but, in the other case, friendship does not appear to have ceased, there is not yet to be discovered any reason to act minically on this account towards a friend."

And, in truth, this reflection, this reflection of authors and writers to conclude that neutral Powers cannot be forbidden to exercise a free trade, even in contraband, as long as they exercise it in an impartial manner with both belligerent parties, or are willing to do so. I, too, cannot say that they decide very unjustly.

I say, then, that for those nations who have not otherwise bound themselves by express compact, it is not a duty of strict right to carry no contraband articles to the belligerent Powers: for, if even a belligerent Power had a full and complete right to set itself against such trade, yet, between two sovereigns, who are placed in the situation of national freedom, equality, and independence, the full right of the one is annulled by the full right of the other. And, in regard of neutral nations, the renunciation of their own convenience in favor of the greater convenience of another is only a duty of equity, but not of essential and strict right.

"Hence it follows that we must often inquire and distinguish whether the trade in those goods which are called contraband is of greater or less importance to the nation which exercises it. In the first case, since we are discussing a duty of favor, which admits of infinite gradations, we cannot confidently expect an extraordinary and very affecting sacrifice, as we may when it extends only to a small inconvenience." 1

Then follow what the author states as the true positions of this matter, some of which you have cited:

1. When a belligerent nation desires a friendly neutral nation to carry no contraband to its enemy, it must formally communicate its wishes to the neutral in the natural state of things.

2. When it has thus disclosed its request, it must itself renounce all pretensions to be furnished with contraband goods.

3. When a neutral State has entered into a treaty of peace and commerce with one of the belligerent Powers, stipulating to carry no contraband to the enemy, there is always a condition implied that the like goods shall be denied to both the belligerent Powers, without distinction.

4. "Consequently the belligerent State, which has never disclosed to its neutral friend that it did not see with content any neutral state supplying its enemy with contraband of war, and much more if it has availed itself of this privilege, has bought arms and other sorts of military stores, or, what is of more account, has received from its soldiers, recruits, horses, has no further right to expect that the neutral should not show the like to the enemy."

5. For the belligerent Power, so acting, to expect that the neutral Power, should not, during the war, carry any contraband of war to the belligerent Powers, must always be followed, when it does not induce a very great and intolerable inconvenience, as much as what tends immediately to the destruction of mankind is with better reason than permitted; and, therefore, this desire, much more than its opposite, comports with true impartiality, since the neutral as much hopes the affair of the enemy as of the good.

I will cite only one more passage from Galliani, which appears to be the result of his considerations on this subject:

B. 1. ch. 9, § 4. "If we reflect more upon it, it must be acknowledged that the first position of the principle, which I have above established, recurs—that belligerent Powers have no full right to make this demand, (not to carry contraband to the enemy) as also that there lies no duty of strict right upon the neutral to refrain from the trade of contraband of war. In the mean time, the desire of the belligerent, who possesses no full right to ask, must be declared in decent and temperate terms; and the request cannot be considered as discreet and acceptable when it occurs too great inconvenience to the party to whom it is addressed."

I will close this letter with a few observations.

It is well known that a considerable portion of the exports of the United States consists of articles contraband of war. It is well known that these have, during the whole of the present war, been freely exported to the dominions of the United States, and as to those of the other belligerent powers, as well as to others, of the French. It is further to be observed that, in Mr. Gallatin's 4th position (for France to desire that the citizens of the United States should now abandon a commerce of which she has availed herself during the several years of the war to this time; and still less ought she, while continuing to enjoy an otherwise unrestrained trade in contraband goods, to expect such an abdication of only a particular article of contraband of which she may have no need, and, is therefore willing to renounce, because it may chance to be very useful to her enemy. Under these circumstances, a compliance on the part of the United States would compromise their interest as well as their neutrality. The wants of two or more belligerent Powers may together embrace the general objects of the commerce of a neutral nation; but, if each were possessed of a right to require the submission to their need of the extensive commerce which was peculiarly useful to its enemy, the entire commerce of such neutral nation might be annihilated.

The article of horses, although not constituting a principal part of the entire commerce of the United States, yet is an item in the trade of some of them, properity of a Foreign Power, and, from the first settlement of the country, it has been a valuable article of exportation from many of the colonies (now States) to all parts of the West Indies; and, during the whole of the present war, horses and mules (and oxen, which may be used for military purposes as well as either) have been freely exported to the French as well as to the English islands.

It would have been easy to present the present war object, and oblige them in every respect of contraband goods to all the belligerent Powers. Without doubting the fact, (of which I had no previous knowledge) I must suppose that very particular motives influenced the Swiss to this determination, which, however full of wisdom at this time, is repugnant to the common practice of those people for ages. "Amidst all the wars of Europe (says Voltaire) the inhabitants of the neutrals nations have done nothing that might be likely to attract the notice of the belligerents, nor to affect the peace of nations. The neutral’s right is to be neither to think less of the offer which was peculiarly useful to the enemy, or to oblige them in the same manner.

In having my former letter entered into a full consideration of this subject, and the force of the distinctions and reasons then taken and urged appearing to me still unshaken, I will content myself with a few remarks.

I must still rely on the distinction taken in the law of the United States, between our citizens serving on board of armed vessels as prisoners or captured, and vessels having no armed officers. A vessel in the service of a neutral nation, when at war, would certainly have been forbidden, as well as the former. To admit that our citizens cannot lawfully enrol themselves in the direct military land or sea service of one of the Powers at war, is very different from your position, that they cannot, in any manner, enter the military service of the United States and exclude them from carrying, even in foreign vessels, not only soldiers, horses, arms, &c. but even provisions: for to the success of military operations the latter are as essential as the former. Probably there is not one of the maritime belligerent Powers that has not, in the course of the present war, derived aid, in its military operations, from provisions and other supplies lawfully furnished by the citizens of the United States. Farther, in my former letter, I proved, from our commercial treaty with France, that it was lawful for the citizens of the United States to transport not only contraband goods, but her enemies, and even soldiers in actual service. For when the two nations, in the 13th and 23d articles, regulated the course of proceedings in such cases, they clearly admitted the legality of the measure, reserving only to each the right of determining the prize of such vessels, and making prisoners of such soldiers. Had the contrary been their intention, instead of regulatung, they would have prohibited the trade or carriage of contraband goods, and the transportation of troops.

Admitting these conclusions to be just, (and such they appear to me) how shall we draw a line between the strong case you have stated, and the transportation of troops and stores in ordinary cases? The case you state is that of a fleet and army destined for some military expedition, and you ask whether the transports of neutrals, following in the train of such an armament, would not make a part of it? I confess to you, that the question presents some difficuly: but as the case does not exist, it is not necessary for me to answer it. I am not informed what is the current of the maritime Powers in this respect. The question between us regards only the detached transportation of articles contraband of war, either in our own vessels or the unarmed vessels of one of the belligerent Powers. On this point, for the reasons now and formerly given, no doubt exists. To restrain the naval and commercial pursuits of neutrals, which by its tendency, be to hamper a nation, and trade. It is the very principle on which Great Britain has, in many of her wars, grounded her practice of capturing neutral vessels, carrying on the simple commerce of her enemies, particularly of France. If, said she, neutral vessels are permitted to transport the commercial trade of France and her colonies, then her sailors, taken from the service of their merchants, will enable her to man more numerous ships of war. But although Britain thus captured the vessels of neutrals, she never considered the persons employed in such commerce, or the nations to which they belonged, as her enemies.

By the 17th and 18th in which you recite the concluding sentence of my former letter, you seem to consider it as very unpardonable. You will therefore permit me to explain it. In your letter, to which that was an answer, you had stated the object; and brought into view the possible consequences of allowing the British to export horses from the United States. It was the 17th and 18th that after the other Powers, and the commerce of such vessels was not looked upon, either by treaty or the law of nations, and that an impartial neutrality forbade the Government to impose the restraint you demanded, to remark that, if the predicted consequences should follow the measures you opposed, the Government had no right to restrain them. If you imagined that even an indifference, much more an unprofitable disposition to the interests of France, gave rise to the remark, the sentiments of the Government have been wholly misconceived.

I have the honor to be, etc.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 29th Floral, (May 18, 1796, O. S.), 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR,

I have just been informed, indirectly, that the House of Representatives has passed a bill for preventing the sale of the prizes which shall be brought in by the ships of war of the belligerent Powers. If this law did not appear to me to destroy the effects of our commercial treaty if it did not appear to me opposite to the duties of an impartial neutral, I might take it as a favorable signal of my interests being unapproached by the other belligerent. But as I have received subject from my Government, oblige me, at present, to transmit some observations which seem to me calculated to merit your attention.

The 17th and 18th articles of their commercial treaty, the United States and France agree, in an explicit manner, that in case one of the two Powers should be at war, its enemies should be excluded from the ports of the other, when they shall have made prizes on its citizens. When they mutually guaranteed a free admission of their ships of war, of their privateers, and of their respective prizes into these ports, it is clear that they implicitly assured to each other the right of there selling these prizes. In fact, France having no continental possessions in America towards the latitude to which English vessels must go on their return to England, it was to her of extreme importance to have friendly ports into which her vessels might conduct their prizes and sell them, without putting them anew to the risks of the sea which would be the case if they were obliged to send them to France or to her colonies. It was also interesting to the Americans engaged in a war with an European Power, to have ports into which they might conduct and freely sell their prizes made upon the coast of Europe, without being forced to cross the Atlantic. These considerations left no doubt that, by the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and France, each nation had implicitly secured to herself the right of selling in the ports of the other the prizes which her ships of war or privateers should have made. This right, which the two nations should enjoy, has been expressly guaranteed by the Government of the United States, by the privy seals of the President of the United States.

Whenever our enemies have attacked a prize made by a privateer, it has been only under the pretext that the privateer had been armed in the United States, and that she had therefore derogated from both the laws of neutrality and the President’s proclamation.

The courts have never condemned French prizes but upon the fact of having armed in the United States; and when the contrary has been fully proved, the privateer had the right of selling the prizes without any obstacle. Yet in virtue of what act could she sell her prize? Of the 22d article of our commercial treaty. This article declares, that the implied right of selling the prizes in the ports of the other nation would be secured to the owners of those prizes, and to the Government of the United States, by the privy seals of the President of the United States.

The enemies of France could not accuse you of violating the rules of neutrality by leaving to her the free exercise of this right, as it resulted from the casus fœderis, and the obligations prescribed by a treaty do not lead a neutral nation from the line of neutrality whenever she acquits herself of them. Therefore, sir, the English cannot, for that reason, bring in her prizes here.

The Secretary of State assured me, in his letter of the 2d July, 1786, that this stipulation of our treaty should be faithfully observed in this respect by the American Government. Since, notwithstanding the similarity of treatment between the two nations, it is stipulated that it should not derogate from former treaties entered into by the United States. It is clear, therefore, from this fact, during the whole course of the present war, no prize, that is to say, nothing which they have in virtue of our treaties enjoy alone, could be brought into our ports to be sold for the benefit of the owners.

In fact, sir, French privateers have never been condemned in the United States, nor has it ever been shown that they did not sell their prizes with the consent of the Government of the United States, and in conformity with the above stipulation of our treaty. If this were done by the American Government, the United States, that is to say, the United States Government, has the right to judge whether the prizes are to be considered as contraband of war or as privateers' property.

In the 17th and 22d article of our treaty with France, the United States have reserved to themselves the right to judge when a prize is to be considered as a privateer's property, and when it is to be considered in the same manner as contraband of war.

It is understood, that all the rights that a privateer has upon the capture of a prize are derived from the right of the Government of the United States, and that these rights are to be exercised by the Government of the United States alone.

The United States, in the treaty already referred to, have also granted to the United States the right to arrest French prizes, and to order them brought into their ports, without the consent of the Government of France.

In the 22d article of our treaty with France, we have granted to that nation the right to dispose of its own prizes, and to order them brought into its ports, without the consent of the Government of the United States.

The right of selling prizes is one of the most important rights of neutral nations, especially during a war, and it is necessary to consider the inconvenience which might arise from a contrary stipulation.

In the treaty between France and the United States, the 17th article is stipulated that it should not be lawful for France to sell prizes made by her privateers, and that they should be disposed of by her Government, and that they should be brought into the ports of the United States.

On the other hand, the United States, in the 22d article, have reserved to themselves the right to dispose of their own prizes, and to order them brought into their ports, without the consent of the Government of France.

their prizes, in our ports, would be faithfully observed by the American Government; and I may confidently repeat, that it will be observed. The law in question furnishes a proof of it, by the universality of its prohibitions. This form of the proposed law ought to rescue the United States from the reproach of favoring Great Britain: for a neutral nation can be responsible only for the equality of its rules of conduct towards the belligerent Powers, and not for the effects of an exact observance of those rules, which must depend on the situation and circumstances of the warring Powers themselves.

No. 133.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 13, 1796.

Sir:
The merchants of Philadelphia are extremely alarmed by the conduct of a small privateer called the Flying Fish, bearing, it is understood, a commission from the French republic. It is said she has been lying in this port for some time, preparing for sea; and it seems, that, after inquiring and observing what valuable vessels were to sail for foreign ports, she sailed herself to the capes of Delaware, and, not far from thence, lay in wait for the vessels she had marked for her prey. Accordingly, on the 9th instant, she seized on the ship Mount Vernon, belonging to Mr. Murgatroyd, a merchant of Philadelphia, within two hours after the pilot had left her, and within about six leagues of Cape Henlopen, took possession of all her papers, and forced the master, mate, and all her crew, save two men, to leave her, and, under these circumstances, she was sent they know not whither! For your more particular information of the circumstances of the capture of this ship, and the designs of the captors, I enclose the protest of the master and his two mates.

Such conduct has more the appearance of an act of piracy, than of the lawful procedure of an armed vessel, regularly commissioned by your republic. Other vessels were on the point of leaving the Delaware bay, but witnessing, or hearing of this outrage, have put back, and returned up the river for safety.

I have been directed, sir, by the President of the United States to represent this case to you, and to request information, if you are possessed of any, concerning this privateer, her name, the name of her commander, whether she is commissioned by the French republic, and what instructions or orders accompany the commission to regulate her conduct.

If the papers found on board the ship, or any other evidence, afforded any just ground to believe her to be the property of an enemy to the French republic, still, neither the master nor the mate (especially the former, I ought to have been removed, but to have been suffered to continue in the ship, that, to whatever port she might be sent for adjudication, a claim on the part of the owners might have been presented at the proper tribunal, and their right maintained. This flagrant violation of a common rule, the observance of which is essential to the support of justice, induces a suspicion that the capturing vessel is a pirate, or a privateer violating the authority of a commission, and the instructions prescribed to regulate her proceedings.

I have only further to express to you, sir, the President’s reliance, that if you are possessed of any information on the subject of this letter, you will communicate the same with the candor and frankness due from the representative of a friendly and allied nation.

With great respect, I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

P. S. The public solicitude is so great on this subject, and so many vessels are, in consequence, detained, you will permit me to request a speedy answer.

PHILADELPHIA, 26 Prorial, (June 14, 1796, O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:
I have received the letter you did me the honor to write me, relative to the seizure of the ship Mount Vernon by the French privateer the Flying Fish.

I am vexed, sir, not to have it in my power to give you the information you request of me. I cannot say whether the privateer, which is certainly a vessel commissioned by the republic, and come from St. Domingo to this port, has or has not acted conformably to orders which have been transmitted to her; I do not know the instructions given by the Directory to its commissioners in the colonies, nor do I know what conduct it has prescribed to them to cause to be observed, by the armed vessels under their orders, in regard to neutrals trading with the enemies of the republic. It is impossible for me, at this moment, to furnish you with precise explanations; I shall, therefore, write to the colonies to obtain them, and I will immediately transmit to you what shall come to my knowledge, as well as to this point, as concerning the event which is the object of your letter. Accept, sir, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 5, 1796.

Sir:
Some time in June last, I troubled you with an inquiry about the privateer called the Flying Fish, which had captured the ship Mount Vernon. The answer you then gave would have superseded any application at this time, had not the owner and officers of the privateer abused your authority, or that of the French consul of Philadelphia, or both: for I am informed, that the owner reports, that from you he had his particular orders to take the Mount Vernon, and many more vessels; and a deposition, now before me, states that some of his officers declare that the consul expressly told them to take the ship Mount Vernon, and that if she was not covered British property, he would indemnify them.

Under these circumstances, the owners deem it important, in the prosecution of their claim, to be furnished with some document which shall enable them to repel the groundless assertions, above mentioned, of Paris and his officers. Hence, I trust you will pardon my trouble you again on this subject, and requesting that you will be pleased to direct the consul to make out an official certificate for that purpose.

With great respect, I am, sir, &c.

Sir:
I have received with astonishment the letter you did me the honor to address to me on the 5th October.

I have interrogated the consul on the subject of which it treats, and I have the honor to inform you, that I have forbidden him to subscribe any declaration relative to an affair in which individuals have undertaken to introduce his and my name without any authority for so doing.

In remaining a stranger to this affair, you may rest assured I observe a conduct as favorable as possible to the interests of the American citizens, in the name of whom the Mount Vernon was fitted out.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 1, 1796.

Sir:
It being the duty of the Executive of the United States to watch over their interests, I am instructed by the President to request of you an explanation on the subject of the following questions.

1. Whether the Government of France have decreed any new regulations or orders relative to the commerce of the United States?
2. Whether these regulations or orders, (if such exist) are confined to vessels laden wholly or in part with provisions? If not so confined, to what other articles they extend?
3. Whether American vessels, laden wholly or in part with provisions, and destined to any other ports than those of France or her dominions, particularly if destined to any English ports, are directed to be captured and carried into French ports, and their cargoes entire, or such parts thereof as consist of provisions, or other specified articles, applied to the use of the French republic or its citizens?
4. If such captures are authorized by the French republic, or by the decrees or orders of any branch of its Government, on what grounds such authority, decrees, or orders, have been given?

These questions, you will perceive, sir, have relation to reports of designs relative to the commerce of the United States, which cannot fail to excite apprehensions in the minds of our merchants. The general interests of the United States are intimately blended with that of the republic, and the good understanding and friendship between the two nations, which has been the uniform desire of the American Government to maintain.

Permit me to request an early answer to this letter.

Sir:
The business with which I have been burthened has prevented me from answering sooner the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 1st of July.

I am sorry, sir, to be obliged to leave you in an uncertainty, in which I myself participate. I do not know the nature of the orders which may have been given by my Government to the officers of the ships of war of the republic, or what conduct it has prescribed to them to hold with regard to the neutral vessels trading with our enemies. I am not informed whether the ancient arrests of the committee of public safety relative to the commerce of the United States are still in force or not. Some considerable time having elapsed, since I have received news from France, I cannot have recourse to old dates to resolve your doubts. I can only refer to the answer which I had the honor of giving to your letter relative to the Mount Vernon.

The consul at Boston has just informed me that the collector of the customs has prevented the unloading and sale of the prizes carried into that port by two French privateers. The consul has ineffectually complained to him. The collector hands to me a letter which he says he received from you.

I request you, sir, to inform me whether the President has caused orders to be given for preventing the sale of prizes conducted into the ports of the United States by vessels of the republic, or privateers armed under its authority, and if so, upon what foundation this prohibition rests?

Accept, sir, &c.

The Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 19, 1796.

Sir:
I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, in answer to mine of the 1st. You embraced the occasion to communicate the information you had received from the consul at Boston, that the collector of the customs there has prevented the unloading and selling of the prizes carried into that port by two French privateers; grounding his proceeding on a letter received from me: and you inquire, whether the President has given orders to prevent the sale of prizes carried into the ports of the United States by vessels of the republic, or privateers armed under its authority, and on what foundation this prohibition rests? I will be frank, sir, in answering these questions, after making some preliminary observations.

The question about the sale of prizes is not a new one. It was agitated, and the point of right settled in the year 1793. Among the state papers communicated to Congress at the close of that year, and which have been published, is a letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Morris, dated the 16th August, in which is the following passage: "The 17th article of our treaty [meaning with France] leaves armed vessels free to conduct, whithsoever they please, the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without paying any duty, and to depart and be conducted freely to the places expressed in their commissions, which the captain shall be obliged to show. It is evident that this article does not contemplate a freedom to sell their prizes here; but on the contrary, a departure to some other place, always to be expressed in their commission, where their validity is to be finally adjudged. In such case it would be as unreasonable to demand duties on the goods they had taken from an enemy, as it would be on the cargo of a merchant vessel touching in our ports for refreshment or advices. And against this the article provides. But the armed vessels of France have been also admitted to land and sell their cargoes for consumption; in which we have as much right should they pay duties as the goods of a merchantman landed and sold for consumption. They have, however, demanded, as a matter of right, to sell them free of duty; a right, they say, given by this article of the treaty, though the article does not give the right to sell at all.

In like manner, the United States in their commercial treaty with Great Britain, in 1786, entered into a stipulation which, in the case of a war between the United States and Great Britain, would have prevented the vessels of the United States from arming as privateers, or selling their prizes in the ports of France. Instead, the 24th article of the latter treaty is but a translation of the 16th between France and Great Britain.

Under this view of the case, sir, as soon as such a provision was made on both sides to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, it became necessary to the Government of the former to countermand the permission formerly given to French privateers to sell their prizes in our ports. Such sales, you have seen, the United States had always a right to prohibit; and by the above mentioned stipulation this right became a duty. These, sir, are the foundations of the orders which have been given to prevent the sale of the prizes lately carried into Boston by British merchantmen, which you have already heard me condemn. These prizes, we have since been made general, and communicated to the collectors in all the ports of the United States. But, at present, those orders are confined to prizes brought into our ports by privateers.

I have the honor, &c.

No. 140.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, the 21st Vendémiaire, (October 12, 1796, O. S.)

5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: The French privateer Leo took into Charleston an English vessel called the Mary. The English consul required that the sale of this vessel should be prohibited, in virtue of the 24th article of the treaty concluded between the King of Great Britain and the United States.

The Government of South Carolina, uncertain as to the interpretation which the 24th article should receive, deferred the execution of the contract, the English consul condemned the prize, and the unloading was commenced. It was stayed by the hands of the marshal, who obliged the agents of the privateer to appear before the admiralty.

A decision, rendered by the chief justice (Ellsworth) in a special court, interdicted the sale of the prize, in virtue of the 24th article of the treaty concluded with England. This decision was confirmed by the circuit court of Carolina, and, when they were going to throw in an appeal to the Supreme Court, the circular letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the sale of our prizes, was made known, and it was conceived that an appeal became useless.

In the mean time, the vessel being ready to sail, she was examined and condemned. The privateer agents, of whom Judge Ellsworth took a bond of 10,000 dollars as a security that they would not sell the prize, solicited permission to export the cargo in neutral vessels: this was refused, and the cargo, which consisted of 87,000 weight of sugar, became a prey to the flames, during the stay at Charleston. Permission, however, has been given to export a trifling part of the cargo, saved from the conflagration.

The condemned vessel was purchased and repaired by an American. His project was to go and sell her in the Antilles; but he was obliged to abandon her, and to cancel his bargain, because he was refused American papers.

The privateer agents then wished to send off this vessel, in ballast, with French papers; the collector of the customs, Mr. Holmes, opposed it, and the vessel remains in the port of Charleston, notwithstanding the protest of the French consul of the 16th Fructidor.

Such is the fate of the contract of Charleston has rendered me an account, about which I spoke to you yesterday, and to which I call your attention. Such is the violation of our treaty, against which I solicit your justice.

The 17th article of our treaty secures to our privateers the faculty of entering into the ports of the United States, and of selling their prizes there. The 24th article of the treaty concluded with Great Britain in truth interdicts the privateers of the country, at war with that Power, from entering the ports of the United States; but, by the 25th article, our rights are acknowledged, and the Government has assured me that it would maintain them.

Our privateers have, therefore, the faculty of freely bringing in and selling their prizes. The collector of the customs has refused to go out of the port of Charleston, without any obstacle, as she entered there; and, therefore, the collector of the customs violated our treaty when he prevented her going out.

But how shall I qualify the refusal given to the agents of the privateer Leo, to export, in neutral vessels, the cargo of this prize? Upon what can such an act be supported? Is there, in the treaty concluded with Great Britain, any explicit stipulation which can be brought forward? Doubtless, there is none; and yet, because our treaty does not contain, in an explicit manner, the right of selling our prizes, it is contested with and refused to us. By a forced interpretation of the treaty concluded with Great Britain, will it be found that we have not the right to export, in a case of necessity, the cargo of our prizes in neutral vessels? This manner of reasoning is, beyond a doubt, inadmissible, and a just and impartial man will never use it. Besides, facts support what I have the honor of saying to you, since the permission, which was refused at first, was afterwards granted. The state of things had not been changed, and the collector of the customs was forced to sell the cargoes of privateers in the custom-houses of Charleston, after the conflagration of Charleston, why did he not allow it before? He was, therefore, moved, not by the spirit of justice which ought to direct his actions, but by a partiality of which it is difficult to give an account; for he should merely have taken care, according to the orders transmitted to him, that the prize was not sold in the United States and it was not for him under any pretext to give a greater extent than really existed to the stipulations of the treaty concluded with the English, in order to make them bear heavy on us. Does this conduct appertain to the agent of a neutral Government? In consequence of it, have I not a right to require that the collector of the customs be punished for having violated the treaty, on the same ground, and, having certainly exercised his powers in a manner which I have a right to object to?

I could wish, sir, it were in my power here to stop my just complaints; but there are other facts which I cannot pass over in silence, and of which it is requisite I should inform you.

The vessel called the Eliza, which has carried into Wilmington, South Carolina, the Betty Cathcart and the Aaron, prizes made upon the English.

The sale of these prizes has been prohibited. They were very leaky. Two tradesmen, named by the collector James Read, have certified that they could not be sent out again to sea. The privateer and her agents demand the sale of these prizes for the benefit of the state, and the collector refused the sale, upon the basis of the 24th article of the treaty concluded with Great Britain. But I now have that article before me, and I see no stipulation which would authorize the collector, James Read, to take the step he has done.

Notwithstanding the solicitations and protestations of the agents of the privateer against his refusal, James Read still persisted in it, although the looks of the Betty Cathcart were such that she made between thirty and forty inches of water in an hour. In this latter circumstance, he founds his conduct on the orders of Government.
I cannot believe, sir, that the collector, James Read, then advanced a fact. I cannot believe that the Federal Government, by hindering the unloading of prizes not in a condition to go to sea, thereby wished to aggravate the conditions of a treaty made with our enemies, when they are already so disadvantageous to us. I cannot believe that it wished to overrule my own motion, to add to the wrongs which the English well know how to do as by their treaty with the United States.

But be this as it may, it is no less true that the officers and crew of the Bellona, as well as those of the Leo, have experienced considerable losses by the conduct of the collectors of the customs of Charleston and Wilmington; that these collections have been made, on the one hand, our treaty has been violated, and, on the other, an arbitrary proceeding, which cannot be justified by any means, has been allowed against French citizens coming into your ports, under the false pretense of previous treaties and conventions, and when they were in no way notified that these conventions were changed. It is no less true, that these citizens have experienced real damage from the doings of the officers of the Treasury, and that the people, therefore, to be the better accorded one another, this is what I request, sir, in the name of justice, besides invoking your severity against the collectors James Read and Holmes.

I hope, that I shall obtain the object of these requests, that the Mary may freely go out under a French flag, and that I shall have only a satisfactory account to render to my Government under these circumstances; but, in order to avoid in future claims of a like nature, I request you to be pleased to answer the following questions:

1. Will the prizes made by the ships of the republic upon the English continue to be sold here?
2. Will the officers and crew of the Leo be permitted to leave here?
3. Shall we unconditionally enjoy the right of unloading the prizes in case of damage, and of having them repaired?
4. Can a part of the prize, sufficient only for the expense of repairs, be sold?

It is useless, sir, for me to enter into any detail to lead you to conceive how important it is for the interests of our neutrals, that I should be able to say to them in a precise manner what they are to expect on coming into your ports.

I shall be much obliged to you, also, if you will be pleased to answer me as speedily as possible, in order that I may inform my Government of your ulterior resolutions. Accept, &c.

No. 141.

Secretary of State to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 15, 1796.

SIR: On the 13th ult. I had the honor to receive your letter of the 12th, but not possessing of any information on the subject, I laid it before the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose immediate superintendence the collectors of the customs are placed. He has favored me with the letters of the collectors of Charleston and Wilmington, against whom you complain, with sundry documents describing their proceedings in regard to the prize ships, which (which you call the Mary) that was brought into the port of Charleston, as a prize to the French privateer Leo; and to the British ship Betty Cathcart and the snow Aaron, which were carried into the port of Wilmington, as prizes to the French privateer Bellona.

If the French consul at Charleston, Mr. Dupont, had correctly stated the facts respecting the ship Amity, I trust you would have found no cause to complain against the collector, Mr. Holmes, whose conduct appears evidently to have been guided by an honest sense of his duty, and the laudable spirit of a citizen, when he saw the laws and authority of his country treated with disrespect. Permit me, then, to state the case from the papers now before me.

On the 7th of April last the privateer Leo carried her prize, the Amity, into Charleston. The prize was entered at the custom house, and security given, as usual, for the duties on her cargo. The Federal court being in session, the British vice-consul applied and obtained an injunction prohibiting the sale of the prize.

Then the captors represented to the collector, that the prize ship was so disabled that she could not proceed to the nearest French port, agreeably to our treaty with France. Thereupon the collector directed a survey of the ship to be made. The persons who surveyed her reported, on the 30th May, various defects in her bottom, beams, decks, masts, yards, rigging, and sails, to prove her to be unfit for sea; and Mr. Vesey, an agent for the captors, asserted, that the ship was incapable of being fitted for sea, and that it was impossible for her to be refitted so as to carry her cargo to any foreign port, or in the cargo of the immense weight of near six hundred hogsheads of sugar, rum, &c. Hence it appeared to the collector that the captors should be allowed to sell the prize goods in other bottoms; and, after taking advice, which confirmed his opinion, he, on the application of the agents, gave the requisite permission. And, in consequence, "the greatest part of the cargo was shipped in neutral bottoms for the benefit of the drawback, the duties having been previously secured." Thus far was all very well; and I cannot but observe, that the proceedings of the collector are marked with liberality.

But now the difficulties began. After the survey had been made, and the greatest part of the cargo shipped in neutral bottoms, the captors, or their agents, in defiance of the laws of the United States [for the British treaty had then become a public law] and in direct contempt of the injunction of the Federal court, sold the prize ship to American citizens; and the French consul, Mr. Dupont, sanctioned the sale. The purchasers immediately repaired the prize ship, which had been declared to be irreparable, and applied to the collector for her clearance as an American vessel. The collector, seeing the deception which had been practised upon him, and considering the violation of the laws, and the contempt of the authority of the United States, very properly refused his concurrence to render those deceitful and illegal acts finally successful.

Your letter, grounded on Mr. Dupont's information, and a memorial of Messrs. North and Vesey to the Secretary of the Treasury, state that the collector refused admission to land the prize cargo on board neutral vessels until after a part of it had been destroyed by fire. But the papers before me, and the evidence of the collector himself, as early as the 30th of May, that the prize cargo might lawfully be carried away in neutral or other bottoms, the prize ship having been considered as irreparable. Hence it appears highly improbable, and nearly impossible, that after the 30th of May, the collector should have refused his permission to export the cargo in neutral vessels. In the interval between the 30th of May and the 13th of June, (when it seems the great fire happened at Charleston) it is possible that no application was made to the collector to permit the exportation of the cargo in neutral vessels. But at no time has the collector displayed a disposition to throw unnecessary difficulties in the way of his suspence, in a case as new as it was important, continued only until he obtained advice which sound discretion required him to ask.

You are under a mistake about the portion of the prize cargo which was destroyed by fire. Permit me to exhibit the facts as they really are. No. 141.

Mr. Vesey, the agents for the prize, the cargo of the ship Amity consisted of:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Item</th>
<th>Quantity</th>
<th>Value</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>490 hogsheads of sugar, wt. gross.</td>
<td></td>
<td>786,306</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>70 tierces do.</td>
<td></td>
<td>70,870</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>310 bags of pimento</td>

<td>857,366</td>

<tr>
<td>27 hds. of rum</td>

<td>2,398</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Consumed in the fire at Charleston, June 13th, 52 hds. of sugar;</td>
<td>87,299</td>
<td>2,093 gallons</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

Which is but little more than a tenth part of the cargo, and it is not intimated that any other part of her cargo was destroyed.
From this state of facts no blame appears to attach to any officer of the United States. The sale of the prize and her cargo was lawfully prohibited; but, by a liberal construction of the treaty with the French republic, permission was given to export the cargo in other vessels when the prize ship was, in effect, merely to pay its agent, once again to go to sea. It is true, that when the collector found himself deceived by the agents, when he found that the ship had been illegally sold to American citizens, and then promptly repaired, he refused those American citizens a clearance for her departure. It is true that the prize, and acknowledgment of the sale to those American citizens, after the American flag had for several days been flying on board her, he refused to permit her discharge as a French prize he refused her to the consul Dupont, who, not respecting the laws and authority of the United States, knowingly sanctioned the sale; and under all these circumstances, will not his refusal be deemed excusable?

In respect to the two prizes carried into Wilmington, in North Carolina, the State does not express, I should betray the collector, Mr. Read, any designed rigor, beyond the requisitions of the laws of the United States. In his letter of the 26th of July to the Secretary of the Treasury, which is now before me, he manifests a desire merely to perform his duty according to his conception of the meaning of the laws; but requests instructions for his guide.

On the 30th of August (the day after his letter was received) the Secretary wrote him directions, particularly to permit the unloading of the prizes, if, upon examination, it appeared necessary to the repairing of them. The collector's temporary opposition to this measure arose evidently from a mistaken construction of a former letter from the Secretary of the Treasury. This mistake was promptly corrected; and it is my opinion that he should be ready to perform his duty, if the agents of the prize shall produce counter proofs, they will receive all due consideration.

To the four questions stated in your letter, be pleased to accept the following answers:

1st. Will the prizes made by the ships of the republic upon the English continue to be sold here?

I have had the honor, in some former letters, to state to you the sense of the Government on this point, with the reasons to support it. Permission to sell prizes was considered by the Government not demandable as of right. The Power permitting could therefore restrain the sales. The only restraint yet imposed has respected captures made by the citizens.

2d. Will the prizes made by the privateers of the republic upon others than the English be sold?

As the original permission to sell prizes extended to those taken from all the enemies of the French republic, and as the restraint lately imposed refers merely to British vessels, pursuant to the article of the treaty just mentioned, so the indulgence, in other respects, is to be considered as revoked. The present opinion will be maintained until the two vessels shall have been discharged.

3d. Shall we unconditionally enjoy the right of unloading the prizes in case of damage, and of having them repaired?

The right of unloading prize vessels, when they are so damaged as to be unfit to proceed to sea without repairs, will not now be controverted; but the unloading and storing of the cargoes must be under the inspection of the proper officers of the United States, as a necessary precaution against a transgression of our laws. And in case the prize vessels are really irreparable, and in consequence are regularly condemned as unfit ever to proceed to sea, their cargoes may be exported as French property, in other bottoms.

4th. Can a part of the prize, sufficient only for the expense of the repairs, be sold?

So much of the prize cargo may be sold as shall bona fide be necessary for the repairs, without which the vessel will be unfit to proceed to sea. But such sales must be made under the inspection of the collectors, pursuant to the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury Department, for securing the duties on imports, and confining the amount of the sales to the necessity of each case.

With respect to the ship Amity at Charleston, the collector of that port will be instructed to permit her departure as a French prize.

This letter substance, as it now appears, was prepared to be sent you in the last month; but doubts arose on some points, concerning which legal opinions were taken, and occasioned the further delay to this time.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 142.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 19th November, (3d Jan., 1796, O. S.) 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:—Instructed to watch over the interests of my country, instructed not to allow either its rights or its honor to be violated, instructed to maintain peace and good harmony between France and the United States of America, and the confidence of my Government, and the duties which my station impose on me, were I now to remain silent on a circumstance which must make all France discontented, and were I not to hasten to give you information of it.

When the National Convention declared that the French flag should be presented by its minis tar to the United States, there was but one opinion as to the place in which it should be deposited. A decree had placed yours in the hall of the legislative body. Every one thought that the French flag would with you receive the same honor; all my fellow-citizens have, one after another, contemplated that pledge of your friendship, and each one believed that the Americans would also have the same eagerness to view the symbol of the enfranchisement of a friendly nation, who, like them, had purchased their freedom at the price of their liberty.

This expectation has not been fulfilled, and it has been decided that the French flag should be shut up among the archives. Whatever may be the expression of friendship in the answer of the President,—however amicable, also, are the relations of the United States and French House of Representatives,—I cannot doubt, sir, that the order made for preserving a flag, which the republic sent only to the United States, will be looked upon by it as a mark of contempt or indifference. Pride, sir, you know, is the portion of a free people; and it is never wounded but at the expense of friendship. The present circumstances are extremely delicate; and when I am convinced the American Government had no intention of offending the French republic to think that the gift of her flag was worth nothing in its eyes, should it not give her authentic proofs of it? Would it not be convenient to fix this flag in a similar place to that which yours occupies in France, and where the national honor expected to see it?

I venture to believe, sir, that when I make you this proposition, you will know how to appreciate my intentions, and my design, with respect to your character, endeavors to prevent every cause of altercation be tween the Governments of two people united by the same interests.

Accept, sir, &c.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 15, 1796.

Sir:—I have received your letter of the 9th, indicating your regrets at the disposition which has been made of the colors you presented to the United States, and your opinion that all France will be dissatisfied.
You remark, that when the National Convention decreed that the colors of France should be presented to the United States, there was but one opinion on the place where they should be deposited; and as a decree had placed those of the United States in the hall of the legislative body, that the French colors would here receive the same honor. You even suppose that the depositing of these colors among the archives of the United States will be received as a mark of contempt, or at least of indifference.

Indeed, sir, I should extremely regret that the real and essential friendship of two free people should be wounded by an instance of this kind, resulting from the different ideas they entertain of the mode most proper for preserving the signs of their liberty, and of the victories and triumphs by which it was acquired.

It should be remembered, that when it was decreed by the National Convention that the colors of the United States should be placed in the hall of their sittings, the representatives of the French people assembled in one room, and that their own colors, it is understood, had been there previously exhibited.

In the United States, on the contrary, the representatives of the people are divided into three branches; for the President and Senators are as truly the representatives of the people as the Members of the other House; the only difference being this, that the latter are chosen immediately by the people, and the two former by persons whom the people have previously chosen to elect them. But each of the three branches of the representatives of the people has its peculiar duties. While that of the House of Representatives is confined to objects of internal legislation, and that of the Senate, embracing the same objects, extends partially to some external concerns, the President is the sole constitutional organ of communication with foreign nations and for this purpose the people have appointed him their sole representative.

When, therefore, the colors of France were delivered to the President, they were in the proper manner presented to the people of the United States of America, for whom the President is the only constitutional depository of foreign connections; while the two Houses of Congress sit as hearken to prepare for their information, and thus the colors of France were exhibited to their view. But the United States have never made a public display of their own colors, except in their ships, and in their military establishments.

Under these circumstances, what honor could be shown to the colors of France more respectful than to deposit them with the evidences and memorials of our own freedom and independence? If to the United States only the colors of France have been presented, I answer that the colors of France alone have been deposited with our national archives, that both may be preserved with equal care.

I must say, in so remark that the people of the United States exhibited no where, in their deliberative assemblies, any public spectacles as the tokens of their victories, the symbols of their triumphs, or the monuments of their freedom. Understanding in what true liberty consists, contented with its enjoyment, and knowing how to preserve it, they reverence the acts of their sister republic. This, I conceive, sir, is the way to "maintain peace and good harmony between France and the United States," and not by demanding of one nation an adoption of the manners of the other; in these we must be mutually free.

This explanation, sir, I hope will be satisfactory to you and to your Government, and in concurrence with the manner of receiving the French colors, and the unanimous sentiments of our citizens and good wishes expressed on the occasion by the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, effectually repel every idea that could wound the friendship subsisting between the two nations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of America to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 13th Ventose, (March 3, 1796. O. S.)

4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SIR:

Some periodical works, and particularly the Directory printed at Philadelphia, have come out this year with an alteration against which it is my duty to complain.

The French ministers have always enjoyed the precedence as to those of England, not only in the United States, but throughout the world; and France, as a republic, has preserved, and will preserve, the rank she has held in the diplomatic corps under her ancient regime.

The French people look upon all people as equal and as brothers; they will never suffer that partial distinctions, contrary to custom, should be granted directly, or indirectly, to any State whatever.

It is usual, sir, for ambassadors of one country to be corrected under the direction of Governments, and with their approbation. I should presume that this is not the case in the United States, since they would have noticed the alteration against which I complain.

If I am mistaken in this respect, as I ought to suppose that this change is only an error, I shall confine myself, sir, to requesting you to have it rectified by suppressing the publication and the Distribution of the Directory and other almanacs in which it has been committed.

But if, as I imagine, these works are the property of individuals, and the Government of the United States can exercise so influence as to their correction, in this case, as their publication, although free, has taken place under the protection of the American laws, and if the alteration therein made should not be contradicted, the public may conclude either that it has been consented to by the Government of the United States, and acquiesced in by me, or that the French republic has acquiesced in the alteration without the prior knowledge and consent of the French plenipotentiary.

I pray, sir, to be pleased to declare in writing, that the Government of the United States have no concern in the printing of the Directory and other works of that kind, in which the agents of the French republic near the United States have been registered this year after those of Great Britain, against the usage and the right of precedence, which belongs to the French republic and to permit me to publish in the newspapers your answer or declaration which I have the honor to request.

Accept, sir, my sentiments of respect and esteem.

No. 145.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. ADET, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 14, 1796.

SIR:

I received your letter of the 3d instant, complaining of an alteration introduced into some periodical works, particularly the Directory printed at Philadelphia, in which the names of foreign agents in the United States are so arranged, that those of Great Britain precede those of France; although (you observe) not only in the United States, but in all the world, France has always enjoyed, in the diplomatic line, the precedence of Great Britain.

You rightly imagine, sir, that works of this kind are not here, as in Europe, edited under the direction of Government. They are all the property of individuals, who print what they please, and in such order as their ideas of propriety, or honor, or accident, may direct. The contents of such annual works are usually confined to facts, the details of which are not of a nature to be subjected to any legal regulation.

Concerning the conduct of the public business, the management of foreign Powers in the United States can have originated in an error, without any direction from the Government, "you request that the error may be corrected, by a suppression of the publication and distribution of the Directory and other almanacs, in which the same error has been committed."

But, sir, this is impossible. These works are, as I have before observed, the property of private citizen, who, having offended against no law, can be subjected to no penalty or loss. The press in the United States, you must have seen, sir, is perfectly free. Not to trouble you with any more remarks, I will close this letter with noting the manner in which the foreign diplomatic characters in the United States have been arranged, in a like annual publication. In the last class is,瑞ter: Those from the French republic, the United Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Prussia, and last of all those from Great Britain.

It is not necessary for me to express any opinion whether this arrangement is erroneous or correct, or whether, among the foreign sovereigns, it is proper that their representatives should be expressed in the rank of their character in the directory, or, as it is called, the legal rank. It is essentially of this that I desire to have the Government of the United States to avoid questions of rank among foreign Powers, who will be no more inclined to submit to their consideration, than to be governed by their decisions.

I can have no objection, sir, to your publishing this answer to your letter, agreeably to your desire. I have the honor to be,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 146.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, May 2, 1796.

"I informed you in my last, of the 95th of March, that I was promised by the Directory, in an audience I had obtained of that body, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs should state to me such objections as were entertained by this body to my measures, the manner in which they had been adopted, and, in particular, the existing impression, not until my reply was received and fully weighed; and I have now the pleasure to transmit to you the result of the communication which afterwards took place between the minister and myself on that subject.

"I do not know what effect my reply has had upon the mind of the Directory, because it was only sent in a few days since. I shall endeavor to ascertain this if possible, and, in case I do, will immediately afterwards apprise you of it."

"I think proper here to communicate to you an incident which took place between the minister and myself, after I had obtained from the Directory a promise that he should state the objections above referred to, and discuss their merits with me, and which was, as heretofore, intimated to you on the 8th of March last. After that period I received from the minister the communication promised, in a note of the same date, but differing in some other respects from the present one, and particularly in the number of complaints, two of the catalogue being now given up by him, and to which I replied as soon as I could prepare my reply, in a note bearing likewise the same date with that which I now enclose you. After he had perused my reply, he was sensible that he had insisted on some points that were not tenable, and, in consequence, asked that I would permit him to retract his note, returning mine, that he might correct himself; and, of course, that I would consider the discussion as yet to be commenced. I told him that, of course, I would accede to his proposal, and consider myself in the light of a solicitor bound to catch at and take advantage of little errors; that I wished, upon all occasions, and with every one, and especially upon the present occasion with him, to act with candor; and, in consequence, I soon afterwards restored him his note and took back my own."

"At the time when I made the minister this promise, I thought it in my power to comply with it. I had, it is true, according to custom, written and enclosed you a copy of both papers, but yet I thought Doctor Brockenbrough, to whom I entrusted my letter for you, was in France, within my reach, that I might recover it. Upon inquiry, however, I found that he had departed, by way of Dunkirk, for England, a route I knew he intended to take, and in which state of things all that I could do was to write and request him to return me that letter, and which I immediately did. I have not yet heard from him, and, of course, cannot tell whether I shall recover it or not. As soon, however, as I knew he was gone, I apprized the minister of it, as likewise of the above circumstances, satisfying him that I was not in any manner dependent on his good faith, or any other, for the production of the measures on this subject; the first propositions were not accepted, and the latter measures fell into disuse. The disgusts, the delays, the losses resulting to our seamen from such a state of things, are palpable. They almost entirely deprive the rights of the admiralty, which is the subject from which they should spring, and, in the light of a solicitor bound to catch at and take advantage of little errors; that I wished, upon all occasions, and with every one, and especially upon the present occasion with him, to act with candor; and, in consequence, I soon afterwards restored him his note and took back my own."

"The minister thought proper to give his second communication the same date with the former one, although more than a fortnight had intervened between the one and the other; and, in consequence, I followed his example, giving my latter reply the same date with the former one. His motive I did not inquire into; mine was that the Directory might see that the delay which took place did not proceed from me."

No. 147.

Summary statement of the complaints of the French republic against the Government of the United States.

First complaint.—The in execution of the treaties.

1st. The courts of justice of the United States have taken and still take cognizance of prizes which our private citizens do conduct into their ports, notwithstanding the express clause of the treaty against it. Our ministers have proposed various arrangements for limiting these usurpations. The Federal Government has promised to make, in every respect, the promises and made; and, in communicating the above to you, I do it as well to explain this transaction, and which will require explanation in case you receive that letter, as to make known to you, as far as depends on me, the condition on which you receive it.

2d. The admission of English ships of war, even in cases where they are excluded by the 17th article of the treaty, that is, when they have made prizes on the republic or on its citizens. The weakness with which the Federal Government conceded this point, in the first instance, has increased the pretensions of Great Britain, and now the Federal Government have ostentatiously made this pretension for the present only, with a view to have there victualled his ships in order to cruise on the American commerce, and to pillage our property. This division carries its audacity even to the conducting thither its prizes.

3d. The consular convention, forming a part of our treaties, is equally unexecuted in its two most important clauses, that is, that the consuls and the consul's officers are not subjected to any penalty or loss. The Federal Government has there victualled his ships in order to cruise on the American commerce, and to pillage our property. This division carries its audacity even to the conducting thither its prizes.

4th. The abandonment of the constitution of the original roll of the crew, in contempt of the 5th article, admitting, in the tribunal of both Powers, copies certified by the consul. Local circumstances in a thousand instances oppose the production of the original roll, and then the seamen are not liable to be apprehended.

4th. The arrestation, in the port of Philadelphia, in the month of August, 1793, of the captain of the corvette the Cassius, for acts committed by him on the high seas. This is contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates "that the commanders of public and of private vessels shall not be detained in any manner." Besides, it violates the most obvious law of nations, which places the officers of public vessels under the safeguard of their flag. The United States have had sufficient proofs of deference on the part of the republic, to count upon its justice in this instance. The captain was imprisoned notwithstanding the consent of the republic produced bail. Scarcely was he set at liberty when the court, although regularly armed at the Cape by General Lavauz, was arrested, (and it appears she is still so) under pretext that, eight months before she sailed from Philadelphia suspected of having armed in that port.

Second complaint.—The impunity of the outrage committed on the republic in the person of its minister, the citizen Fauchet, by the vice-admiralty court of Great Britain, is a source of the greatest alarm to the United States. The warrant in the waters of the United States of the packet boat having citizen Fauchet on board, the search made in the trunks of that minister, with the avowed object of seizing his person and papers, merited an example. The insult was committed on the 1st of August, 1793, (O. S.) the shop all of the month blocked up the Medusa frigate, belonging to the United States, at Portland, and did not receive orders to depart till after the sailing of that vessel. For a new outrage on the United States by a menacing letter, the exequatur was withdrawn from the consul merely for having taken a part in the latter insult.

Third complaint.—The treaty concluded in November, 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, it will be easy to prove that the United States in this treaty have knowingly and evidently sacrificed their connexions with the republic and the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality.

1st. The United States, besides having departed from the principles established by the armed neutrality during the wars of the Revolution, and the 1st of the present war, have, in the person of the minister, and in that of the consul, alledged the pretensions raised by England as a right to create in us a constant act of war in our colonies, and even in France, by the force of a bare proclamation. This abandonment of the independence of their commerce is incompatible with their neutrality. Mr. Jefferson has himself acknowledged it in his letter of 7th September, to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, on the subject of the complaint. It is natural, especially from the formalities of the King of Great Britain, from which the commerce of the United States as well as their national honor have suffered so much, a result quite different was hoped from the negotiation of Mr. Jay. It is evident by the clause of the treaty limiting the existence of this descent from the neutrality to the duration of the present war, that the United States have been brought on as a sacrifice to the convenience of the King of Great Britain during the remoter hostilities which should decide their fate. Mr. Monroe is left to judge how far these concessions accord with the obligation contracted by the United States to defend our colonial possessions, and with the no less sacred duties imposed on them by the immense and invaluable benefits which they draw from their commerce with them.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

PARIS, the 19th Ventose, (March 9, 1796.)

1796, 1st year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, 29th Ventose, (15th of March, 1796.) 4th year of the French republic, and 20th of the independence of the United States of America.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I was lately honored with your note of the 19th of Ventose, (9th of March) objecting to several of the measures of our Government that have occurred in the course of the present war, and to which, I presume, I shall herein render you a satisfactory answer. For this purpose, I shall pursue, in reply, the order you have observed in stating those objections, and, according to the lights which you have given on the subject, give you an account of the events which have happened heretofore.

These objections are comprised under three distinct heads, a summary of which I will first expose, that my reply to each may be better understood.

1. Your first complaint is, that we have failed to execute our treaties with you, and in the following respects:

1st. By submitting to our tribunals the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers. 2d. By admitting English vessels of war into our ports, against the stipulation of the 17th article of our treaty of commerce, even after such vessels had taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. 3d. By omitting to execute their usual convention in favor of its signer and the clauses, having related to the Public, as you suggest, suitable means for carrying those clauses into effect, the first of which secures to your consuls within the United States the exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies between French citizens, and the second the right to pursue and recover all mariners who desert from your vessels.

4th. By suffering, in the port of Philadelphia, the arrestation of the Captain of the corvette Cassius for an act committed by him on the high seas, and which you say is contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates, "that the commandants of public and private vessels shall not be detained in any manner," and the rights of nations, which put such officers under the protection of their respective flags.

And by thus suffering the arrestation of that corvette, though armed at the Cape, upon the pretext that she was armed in the United States.

2. Your second complaint states that an outrage which was made to this republic in the person of its minister, citizen Fauchet, by an English vessel (the Africa) in concert with an English consul, in arresting, within the jurisdiction of the United States, the packet boat in which he had embarked for the Cape, and damaging the property on the high seas, was not taken in a suitable time to remedy the evil, and were produced by a subsequent outrage, and of a very different kind.

3. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England, and which you say not only sacrifices in favor of that Power our treaties with France, but departs from that line of impartiality which, as a neutral nation, we ought to pursue. To observe these objections are given of this charge in your note, and which I shall particularly notice when I come to reply to it.

This is a summary of your complaints, and to each of which I will now give a precise, and, I flatter myself, a satisfactory answer.

1. Of the inexecution of our treaties with this republic, and of the first example given of it, "the submission to our tribunals the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers."

 Permit me, in reply to this charge, to ask whether you insist, as a general principle, that our tribunals are inhibited from taking cognizance of the validity of your prizes, in all cases, are there exceptions to it? As a general principle, without exception, it cannot, I think, be insisted on, because examples may be given under it of possible cases, which prove it cannot be so construed and executed without an encroachment upon the inherent and unalienable rights of sovereignty in both nations, which neither intended to make, nor does the treaty warrant.
Suppose, for instance, a prize was taken within our jurisdiction, not upon the high sea, nor even at the entrance or mouth of any of those great rivers and bays which partake and terminate on both sides of our coasts, but within the case over which our tribunals, or some other branch of our Government, have no right to take cognizance? Do you conceive that the true import of the treaty imposes upon us, and likewise upon you in turn, the obligation thus to abandon a theatre of warfare in which you bear no part? The answer is patent. Can it be supposed that the privateer which took the prize, and led it into port, was fitted out within the United States, the act being unauthorized by treaty: could we tolerate this, and refuse the like liberty to the other nation at war, without departing from that line of neutrality we ought to keep, if we would secure an asylum to all vessels which are secured by treaty? Can it be supposed that the privateer which took the prize, and led it into port, was fitted out within the United States, and, if these are transcended, that the nation so acting makes itself a party to the war, and, in consequence, merits to be considered and treated as such. These examples prove that there are some exceptions to the general principle, and perhaps to others which are not so obvious to occur in question, as those above mentioned.

You will observe that I admit the principle, if a prize was taken upon the high sea, and by a privateer fitted out within the republic or its dominions, that, in such case, our courts have no right to take cognizance of its validity: but is any case of this kind alleged? I presume none is, or can be made. We have therefore nothing to do, except to execute our treaties with this republic states that, in contravention of the 17th article of the treaty of commerce, we have admitted British vessels of war into our ports, even such as have taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. The article referred to stipulates the right for your vessels of war and privateers to enter our ports with their prizes, and inhibits that right to others.

It does not stipulate that the vessels of war belonging to your enemies shall not enter, but simply that they shall not enter with their prizes. This latter act is, I presume, therefore, the subject of your complaint. Here, too, it only stipulates that, in case such vessels enter your or our ports, proper measures shall be taken to compel their removal. Of this it was the rebels themselves who were in the right, and which I cannot decide, as I know nothing about it. Our coast is extensive, our harbors numerous, and the distress of the weather may have forced them in; or they may have entered wantonly, and in contempt of the authority of our Government. Many outlaws have been committed on this basis of right, and the authority of the executive in this respect has been sustained. But I cannot entertain an opinion that no countenance was given by our Government to the entrance of those vessels, whilst they were there, and that all suitable means were taken to compel them to retire, and without delay. You know we have no fleet, and it is difficult without it to execute a stipulation of this kind with that promptitude which your agents in our country, ardent in your cause, and faithful to your interest, might expect.

3. The third article under this head states that we have omitted to execute the consular convention in two of its most important clauses, the first of which secures to the consuls of each nation in the ports of the other the exclusion of controversies between the citizens of each country which gives to the consuls a right to recover such mariners as desert from the vessels of their respective nations.

Up to the first, the supposed incompetency of the law, provided, on our part, to execute the judgments of your consuls within our jurisdiction, and in the second, that we have not given the case of a British vessel captured by our officers, and which was sent to the United States, to the respective courts of jurisdiction. Upon the second, which states that the judges charged by our law to issue warrants for arresting such of your mariners as desert from their vessels, have latterly required, and against the spirit of the treaty, the presentation of the original registers of the vessels to which they belonged, as the ground wherein to act, I have no objection to be taken; the law, as it stands, has been interpreted in different ways; and that the copies spoken of in another part of the treaty, (the fifth article) obviously apply to other objects, and not to this. More fully, however, to explain to you the conduct of our Government upon this subject, permit me here to add an extract from our law, passed on the 14th of April, 1792, expressly to carry into effect the convention in question, and which applies to both cases. The third article of the United States shall, within their respective districts, be the competent judges for the purposes expressed in the ninth article of the said convention, and it shall be incumbent on them to give aid to the consuls and vice consuls of France, in arresting and securing deserters from British vessels of war, and in the case of vessels of foreign nation, which have been seized, or which the said consuls or vice consuls are able to produce, and the consuls and vice consuls of France are entitled to the aid of the competent officers of the United States, in the execution of any precept, the marshals of the United States, and their deputies, shall, within their respective districts, be the competent officers, and shall give their aid, according to the tenor of the said convention. By this law, you will find, it is declared that no officer, by whatever right, or under what pretense, can frustrate or embarrass the execution of this treaty: on the contrary, that it was its intention to carry it into full effect, according to its true intent and meaning, and that it has done so, so far as it could be done by suitable legal provisions.

But, be it here observed, be deemed a subject worthy consideration, whether the first of these clauses in that convention had not better be expounded from it. The principle of a foreign court, established within any country, with jurisdiction independent of that country, cannot well be reconciled with any correct idea of its sovereignty; nor can it exercise its functions without in many instances strifes and discontent between the two Governments. These, however, are not the only objections to the measure, though, with me, they are unanswerable. Under circumstances the most favorable, it was difficult for these consular tribunals to serve their process and execute their judgments: a limited jurisdiction to a town or village only admits of it. In the United States, therefore, and in France, where the territory is immense, and the number of citizens of each country, in the other, considerable, as is now the case, it becomes impossible. Many of these in each country, dwell, perhaps, in the interior, and not within one hundred leagues of any consular of their nation; and how can their attendance be obtained? His father, judge, or other relations, rewards? For the tribunals of one country, they are tribunals of the other; to execute its sentences or judgments, is an indispensable function; but, to send those officers round the country, through the range of one hundred leagues, is still more so. Permit me, then, to ask, what are the motives on your or our part, for such an institution? In what respect are you or we interested by the cause of your officers, or our citizens in each other's country? Why not submit those controversies, in common with all others, to the tribunals of each nation? Some considerations in favor of the institution, it is true, occur, but yet these are light and trifling, when compared with the numerous and strong objections that oppose it. So much, however, by way of diversion.

4. Your fourth and last example under this head, states that the captain of the corvette Cassius was arrested in Philadelphia, for an act committed on the high sea, contrary, as you suggest, to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which provides for the indemnities of the consuls and of the well known rights of nations, which put the officers of public vessels under the safeguard of their respective flags, and that the said corvette was, likewise, seized, though armed at the Cape, under the pretext that she was armed, some time before, in Philadelphia. I have been in the same situation, but with the difference, that whereas the captain was charged, I can, of course, give no explanation on that head. Satisfied, however, I am, that, if the crime was of a nature to authorize our courts to take cognizance of it, he would not be excepted from their jurisdiction by the article of the treaty in question, since that article, as you will perceive, was intended to establish a general principle in the interstate commerce, between the two states, to give the privilege to the ships of war of each, to enter and retire from the ports of the other, and not to secure, in favor of any particular delinquent, an immunity from crimes: nor, in my opinion, does the law of nations admit of a different construction, or give any other protection. I am happy, however, to hear that he is released, since it furnishes an additional proof that the whole transaction was a judicial one, regular, according to the course of our law, and mingling nothing in it, in any view, that ought to give offence here.

Thus, the case was before the court, and the question was the evidence upon the pretext that she was armed in Philadelphia. I have only to say, that, if she was armed there, it was the duty of our Government to seize her; the right to arm not being stipulated by treaty; and, if that was alleged upon sufficient testimony, as I presume was the case, there was no other way of determining the question than by an examination into it, and, in the interim, preventing her sailing. It would have been the part of wisdom to examine the question, and afterward, if the decision was against her. On the contrary, such conduct would not only justly expose us to the charge of committing a breach of neutrality, but of, likewise, doing it collusively.

2. Your second complaint states an outrage which was committed by a British frigate upon your minister, the citizen James Lent, and on that occasion the packet was boarded by the British in the waters of the United States, and the citizen Lent was confined. This was done contrary to the Treaty of Peace and Amity, which stipulated, "that neither party shall seize or confine any person of the citizens or subjects of the other party without a trial of his case by a court of justice of the country in which he shall be confined or detained," etc.

The punishment which was inflicted by our Government upon the parties who committed that outrage, by revoking the exequatur of the consul, and ordering that all supplies should be withheld from the frigate, as, likewise, that she should forthwith depart without the waters of the United States, was, I think you will admit, an adequate one for the offence. Certain it is, that, as we have no fleet, it was the only one in our power to inflict, and that this punishment was inflicted in consequence of that outrage. You will, I presume, likewise admit, after you have perused the act of the President upon that subject, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you, and by which you will perceive that there was, in truth, no distinct outrage offered to the United States, upon that occasion, by the parties in question, but that both the one and the other act (the attempt made upon the packet boat in which your minister had embarked, by the captain of a British frigate, and which constituted the first, and the writing of an insolent letter, by the same captain, to the Governor of Rhode Island, in concert with the British consul there, and which constituted the second) were only several incidents to the same transaction, forming, together, a single offence, and for which that punishment was inflicted on those parties.

I think proper here to add, as a further proof that the President was neither inattentive to what was due to your right, nor to the interests of the United States, that he gave orders to our minister at London to complain formally to that Government of that outrage, and to demand of it that satisfaction upon the parties, as the nature of the insult required, and which has, doubtless, either been given, or is still expected.

3. The third complaint relates to a breach of a treaty with France, to which the United States, Britain, and France, has assented, in favor of that Power, our connexion with France, and the rights of neutrality, the most common.

1st. In support of this charge you observe that we have not only departed from the principles of the armed neutrality adopted in the course of the last war, but have abandoned, in favor of England, the limits which the right of nations and our own treaties with all other Powers, and even England, in her treaties with many other Powers, have given to contraband.

2d. That we have also consented that provisions should be deemed contraband, not when destined to a blockaded port only, as should be the case, but in all cases, by tacitly acknowledging the pretensions of England to place at pleasure, and by proclamation, not only your islands, but even France herself, in that dilemma.

The principles of the armed neutrality set on foot by the Empress of Russia, in harmony with the other neutral Powers, at the time you mention, and acceded to by all the Powers then at war against England, are extremely dear to my hearts. I am, and, in many respects, very important to our welfare. By the manner in which the treaty we make with those Powers who are willing to adopt them, and our hope is, that they will soon become universal. But, even in the war of which you speak, and when the combination against England was most formidable, all the maritime Powers were arranged against her, you well know that she never acceded to them. How could he, then, on the present occasion, when that combination was not only broken, but many of the Powers, they parties to it against England, were now enlisted on her side, in support of her principles. You must be sensible that, under these circumstances, it was impossible for us to obtain from that Power the recognition of those principles, and that of course we are not culpable for having failed to accomplish that object.

I regret, also, that we did not succeed in obtaining a more liberal scale of contraband from that Power than was obtained: for, as our articles of exportation are chiefly articles of the first necessity, and always in great demand here, and every where else, it was equally an object of importance to us to enlarge the freedom of commerce in that respect, and that it was a subject of advantage on the continent, which is our chief competitor. But here, too, the same difficulty occurred that had in the preceding case, and it was in consequence deemed expedient, for the time, to relinquish a point we could not obtain, suffering the ancient law of nations to remain unchanged in any respect. It is urged that we have made any article contraband that was not so before by the ancient law, and that England has a law that was not so before, and that we daily seize when they fell in her way? This cannot be urged, because the fact is otherwise: for, although we have not amended the law of nations in that respect, yet certainly we have not changed it for the worse, and which alone is the effect of your last case.

With respect to the objection stated to a clause in the 18th article of the treaty with England, which presumes we are thereby prohibited bringing provisions from the United States to France, I have only to add that no such prohibition is to be found in it, or other stipulation which changes the law of nations in that respect on the contrary, that article leaves the law of nations where it was before, authorizing the seizure in those cases only where such provisions are contraband by "the existing law of nations," and according to our construction when carrying to a blockaded port, and in which case payment is stipulated; but in no respect is the law of nations changed, or any right given to the British to seize, other than they had before, and such, I presume, you will agree is the true import of that article.

You will observe, by the article in question, that when our provisions, destined for a blockaded port, are seized, though subject by the law of nations to confiscation, they are, nevertheless, exempted from it, and the owners of such provisions entitled to their value. Surely this stipulation cannot tend to discourage my countrymen from adventuring with provisions into the ports of this republic, nor in any other respect prevent their enterprises. On the contrary, was it not probable that it would produce the opposite effect, since thereby the only penalty which could be given for the act of confiscation, in that case (absolutely mentioned, was completely done away?

Thus, citizen minister, I have ventured, according to the views of the Government, and the light I have upon the subject, the objections you have stated against several of its measures, adopted in the course of the present war, and I hope to your satisfaction. That any occurrence should take place in the annals of the two republics, which gage the respect of one or the other to the other, is not conducive to our interests, and if we refuse to be a source of offense, is a circumstance that cannot otherwise than give pain to our Government and our people. That these, however, should be removed by a fair and candid examination of your complaints, on both sides, is the best consolation that such an occurrence can admit. If, by my feeble efforts, I contribute in any degree to promote that end, and preserve the friendship of our two countries, and subsist the mutual respect and affection with which I trust will always subsist, I accomplish an object the most grateful to my feelings that I can possibly accomplish.

Permit me, in concluding this letter, to assure you of the great respect and esteem with which I am your most obedient and very humble servant,

JAMES MONROE.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States to Mr. Randolph, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, 22d Thermidor, (10th August, 1795, O. S.)

3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir:

The neutrality of the United States, and the law of nations, have just been violated in the most serious manner. It is but too true that the English wished to take citizen Fauchet and his papers from on board one of your vessels, and in the waters of the United States. The letters from citizen Fauchet and Pichon, that of the consul at Newport, the affidavit of the passengers of the packet the Peggy, leave no doubt upon this wicked attempt.

I should not have spoken to you at all on the subject if the French republic had not been outraged. But you know, as well do, sir, that a minister, on quitting his functions, does not, on that account, lose his privileges, or his rights; that he retains them until his return to the power by whom he was sent. His safety, his inviolability, are as much under the safeguard of the law of nations as those of a minister exercising his functions, and you owe him the same protection. Nations are agreed in this principle; it is mentioned by the authors who have written on the public law, and you will find it reported in Vattel, (§ 125, chap. 9, book 4, vol. 3, Amsterdam edition, 1775.) The premeditated insult against the citizen Fauchet, therefore, is at once an injury against the United States and the French republic. I should betray my most sacred duty were I not bitterly to complain of it, and, in soliciting you to cause reparation to be made, I was not to pray you to take measures for preventing a similar outrage in future. It was vain to seek to excuse those who have committed it, they were ignorant of the laws of nations. They were instruments made use of by men who could not be unacquainted with those laws. The English vice consul, Moore, presided on board the Africa on the pillage of the American packet boat; and how could he justify this outrage of which modern Carthagin can alone give an example?

Were such an infraction of the laws of nations passed over in silence, what safety should I then find here? Who would prevent the pirates of Great Britain from forcing my house in the night, from carrying me off in one of their vessels, and loading me with iron? What, then, would there be sacred among nations, if the character of a minister were no longer respected? And if a single nation could always trample every principle, all conventions, under foot, without exciting a murmur or complaint?

It would offend you, sir, I would no longer to insist. The honor of your country, the respect you owe to its faithful ally, the attachment you bear to her, will speak much better than I can.

Accept, sir,

P. A. ADET.

The Vice consul of the French republic at Newport Rhode Island to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the said republic near the United States of America.

NEWPORT RHODE ISLAND, the 16th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The most formal violation of the territory of the United States, and the most serious insult, has been committed, and it was a functionality of the republic, citizen Fauchet, who was the object of it.

On Saturday last the packet boat Peggy, coming from New York, and on board of which the minister had embarked, was arrested at about two miles and a half from the light house, by the English ship Africa, lying at anchor, which obliged the captain of the packet to come within a few fathoms of her. The officers sent to visit, on coming on board asked for citizen Fauchet and his trunks, of which they knew the exact number; they were answered that the said citizen had landed at Stonington; they then asked to see his effects, and appeared as though they intended to seize his papers. It was easy to discover their disappointment, when the empty pasteboard cases were presented to them. The most indelent researches were made in the minister’s trunks, and in those of citizens Bouronville and Pichon; some papers belonging to the latter were transported on board of the ship, but were returned. The design failed; it was citizen Fauchet and his papers that they searched; and by the most fortunate circumstances, he defeated the audacious act projected against him. I had fortunately been advised of the packet boat putting into Stonington, and heaven suggested to me the idea of notifying citizen Fauchet by express of the station of the ship. He delivered with his papers only, and thence came here by land.

Nothing proves better the fixed intention of the English to take the citizen Fauchet and his papers than the conduct of the English consul on the same day: at daylight he went on board the Africa, and did not return until after it was ascertained that the project formed by him and his companions in depredation, had failed.

I immediately gave an account of this transaction to the Governor of Rhode Island by sending him a copy of the affidavit of the packet (affidavit du packet) of which I herein enclose another authentic copy, together with one of my letters to the Governor of this State, that you may be enabled to make such application to the Government of the United States as you shall think proper.

Health and fraternity.

Be it known unto all whom it may concern, that on the day of the date hereof, before me, Christopher Ellery, public notary for the county of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in the United States of America, at the house of Mr. Thomas Peggy, of this port, just arrived from New York, and Louis Andrew Pichon, former secretary of the legation of the French Republic to the United States, passenger on board said sloop, together with T. A. Hoffer, citizen of Boston, and Captain Chabert, also passengers on board the said sloop, all of whom on their oaths declare, that yesterday, at three of the clock in the afternoon, being the 1st day of August instant, they were at the distance of two miles from the light-house in Narragansett Bay, in said sloop, bound to Newport; when, being opposite to the same, a British ship of war, the Africa, commanded by Mr. Fauchet, whom they knew to be on board with despatches, that the master and passengers then informed them that Mr. Fauchet had left the sloop in the morning at Stonington, where she had been detained two days by contrary winds, and that he had also that morning left Stonington aforesaid, to take a horseshow, with his despatches and public papers, which were all taken out of paste bound boxes; as proof of the last assertion showing the said boxes empty, five in number; that Mr. Fauchet had really left the sloop, and had gone on overland as aforesaid; that the officers aforesaid, not satisfied with the answers given, said their orders were positive, and directed them to search all the trunks of the passengers, at which proceeding they hoped a box on board would be hurt, as their duty required the same; that they accordingly had all the trunks and boxes in the cabin opened, and, not finding any papers, then went into the hold, where, having ordered Mr. Fauchet's servant to open the trunks of his master, they had them emptied in presence of all the passengers, and out of one of the trunks they took a bundle of papers, which they gave to one of the officers in care, whilst the search went on for the other trunks; that they asked for two other trunks of Mr. Fauchet's, saying they had notice of four trunks shipped on board said sloop, and seeing several other trunks stowed about, they, the said officers, demanded them; that one of them belonged to Captain Chabert aforesaid, a gentleman engaged in commercial and seafaring business, was overhauled, and the papers, consisting chiefly of sea books or journals, examined and put aside, with a tin box containing some papers, with letters directed to different persons in France; that they then fell upon the trunk of Mr. Pichon, which, as they found heavy, they desired to have opened, the threatening, as no one stepped forward with the key, to break the lock thereof; that Mr. Pichon then came forward, and opened the trunk, which proved to be full of written papers, under clothes; these throwing out, they observed that it was the trunk of Mr. Fauchet's secretary, and that it contained such a quantity of papers was a sufficient reason for taking it on board the ship, for the inspection of the captain of the ship; that an officer then went on board the ship with such papers as he thought proper, and that he received the directions of the commanding officer relative thereto, and relative to further proceedings; that this officer soon returned, and permitted the sloop to depart, saying that the main object being missed, no further detention was necessary, and returning the papers which he had taken on board the ship; and that the two officers left the sloop, after a detention of two hours, she came to sail, and arrived at Newport in the morning.

Copy of the letter from the Vice Consul of the French republic at Newport to the Governor of Rhode Island.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND, 16th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Sir: A multiplicity of business has prevented me from paying you my respects, and obliged me to present them to you by letter. I am sensibly affected, in commencing my official correspondence with your excellency on an affair of a disagreeable nature, which obliges me to claim immediately the protection of the United States in the following case.

I have the honor to lay before you the affidavit of Thomas Bliss, captain of the Peggy, on her way from New York to Newport, on board of which citizen Fauchet, minister of the French republic, was passenger. You will observe that this packet was arrested very near the land, in the waters of the United States, obliged by force of arms to come to near our port; and on the 1st of August, in which was at anchor, and afterwards fitted with an indemnity carried so far as not to allow a coat of the minister to be exempt from the basset researches; but he ultimately owes no penalty escape to the precaution he took of landing at Stonington.

The laws of nations, the reciprocal respect of the two Governments, the sacred rights of territory and hospitality, have been grossly invaded by the acts of the French government.

Permit me to address myself to your excellency, and to request you to take such measures as your justice and prudence shall dictate, for repressing such audacious infractions of the laws of nations, and to prevent the functioning of a republic in friendship with the United States from being exposed to such humiliating insults.

I am, with respect, &c.

No. 154.

Joseph Faucher to Citizen Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States.

NEWPORT, 11th Thermidor, 3d year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Citizen:

The vice consul at Newport transmits to you the affidavit of the passengers who were on board the packet boat Peggy, of Newport, which was stopped and examined by the English ship Africa, at the entrance of this port, and within two miles of the land. I do not make any reflection on this insult, which at once violates the law of nations and the neutrality of the United States.

I have examined the facts and have ascertained that the English officers have affixed their signatures to the impressions, which will appear unheard of by only those who are unacquainted with the history of the English. I shall express to you but one afflictive sentiment, which is, that, in a free State, with a Government in which England has just acquired a friend, there is no safety for myself or my papers; for, in a word, you are in a neutral port, that I was to have been carried off, there is no reason why I should not be taken on the high way, or in an inn, if it could be done with impunity. What well thinking American will not grieve, my friend, at hearing that it was on the spot where French blood, for the first time, was shed for American independence, that this attempt was made to strike at our liberty.

When I have any details you will find them in a letter written to me by citizen Pichon, whom I left on board the packet boat to inform me of events.

Receive the assurance, &c.

JH. FAUCHET.

P.S. The Africa has just anchored at Cannonict ferry; she was driven in by stress of weather. Her last conduct gives her a great claim to the enjoyment of the most sacred hospitality of the Americans.

No. 155.

Mr. Pichon to Mr. Faucher.

NEWPORT, 13th Thermidor, (2d August, 1795.) 3d year of the French republic.

Citizen:

I cannot but felicitate you on the resolution you took yesterday, of setting off with your papers, from Stonington, for this city, by land. The information you had received of the design formed by the English for intercepting the sloop on board of which you had embarked, and seizing you and your papers, is verified, I acknowledge, in a manner calculated to render me less confident in the apparent safety of our passage, and I have reason to repent my not having followed you with citizen Bournonville. This disaster, however, has happily cost me but a few moments of desiquetude, and, moreover, given me an opportunity of seeing the proceedings of the English on this occasion, in all their mazes, and the motives to their operations.

You have, doubtless, already heard, by public report, of the arrestation of the sloop Peggy, by the English ship Africa, in sight of the port at Newport. Immediately on my arrival in this city, I had the proper steps taken for obtaining, before a proper officer, the declaration of Captain Bliss, and of the passengers whom I could collect.

I found I had been anticipated in this by Mr. Martin, commandant of the militia of this county. This officer had already taken measures for the same object, with the view of directly informing the General Government of what had taken place, according to the circular orders expedited by the President of the United States to the Executives of the different States. I thought it my duty, however, to take a copy of Captain Bliss's and the passengers' deposition, certified by a notary public, among the number of whom you will find my signature. I have the honor to send you this copy, which I took expressly to transmit to you.

The principal facts are established completely in the affidavit. I am sorry the dispersion of the passengers, who are already either scattered through the city, or set out for Providence and Boston, did not allow a greater number of signatures. However, the authenticity of the deposition will probably not be contested: if it should, the rest of the passengers, who are all citizens of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, might still be called upon as evidence.

On my part, I have nothing very particular to add to this letter; but, however, as I have, according to your orders, carefully observed every thing that passed on this occasion, I shall report some circumstances which may be more particularly interesting to you.

The Africa's boats had some arms. The officers had their swords, and one or two pairs of pistols in the stern of each boat. This circumstance, added to the firing of a cannon at us, loaded with frog bullets, and to our being near the vessel, several pieces pointed, sufficiently show the intention of the commander, if we had endeavored to avoid him, or to gain the land.

When the search in the cabin was finished, they went to the hold. They desired the captain to point out our effects. He answered that he did not know the passengers' baggage. I then advised your servant to deny his having the keys, in case they should ask him for them. However, on hearing the officers who commanded the party say that they would break open your trunks, and reflecting that resistance would only augment suspicion, I desired him to go down and open them. The two of which he had the keys were examined with the exactness of an excise officer endeavoring to discover contraband goods. The whole was overturned and ransacked. During this operation, it was mentioned that the papers were all they wanted, and, in a low tone of voice, they felicitated themselves at having found them. They took, from one of the trunks, a bundle of papers, which I supposed to be letters for individuals. The officers, finding nothing more, inspired for two other trunks, observing it was known that Mr. Faucher had embarked four trunks at New York. In the search for them, they met with a trunk belonging to citizen Chabert. They found his papers relative to his commanding the Argonaut, belonging to the India company, and also the ship called the Citizen of Marseilles. His journals, his charts, some signals, papers concerning his affairs, letters addressed to divers persons in France, all these appeared important to the officers, who judged in the gross, from the appearances, but were otherwise ignorant of the French language; the whole was thrown into a handwritten, and set aside. They then came to my largest trunk. I had, hitherto, remained unknown. The owner was asked for. I kept at a distance, until finding they were going to break it open, I went down with the keys. They had emptied every bundle of papers, overturned the whole, without, however, being able to read any. I observed to these gentlemen, that, their avowed object being to seize dispatches, they should not so freely overturn papers which were neither sealed nor covered. They replied by several observations more or less ridiculous, which showed their ignorance of the French language, and ended by saying, that such was the fortune of war. As you will observe in the affidavit how the scene terminated, I omit repeating it here.

I had decided to follow my papers on board the Africa, if they had taken them there, in order to assist at so insolent an inspection. The only fear I had was, that of being taken on the high road, which the search ended, that they were ashamed for having been so minute in it when they found the ships passengers, which the search began. I was there, during the detention of the packet boat. This circumstance characterizes the infraction of which you were to have been the victim; it bespeaks the intervention of a superior authority, who would in vain
FRANCE.

Timothy Fenner, Secretary of State for the United States.

I informed you by my letter of the 10th August, (old style) of the insult committed by the English ship of war Africa on the neutrality of the United States and the law of nations. I requested from you a reparation proportioned to the outrage committed towards the republic of France on the person of my predecessor. I requested it in the name of justice, in the name of the friendship which unites our two countries; I had every reason to expect it. From what I have heard, I am informed that this insult is not, sir, that the captain of the Africa, whose injurious proceedings are known, still finds an asylum in the ports of the United States; insults by his menaces the authority of your country: and dares to claim the same advantages enjoyed by the French frigate Medusa at Newport, and preserves his station in the middle of the entrance of that port? He will, without doubt, not quit this station unless it be to pursue the frigate Medusa. Notwithstanding the law of nations, and the proclamation of the President of the United States, which prohibits all vessels of war from going out of the ports of the United States, or from using them as a station in order to cruise against enemy vessels. Can any other design be imputed to the Africa, and are not the friendship which the United States bear to France, the respect due to their neutrality, the honor of their Government and their laws, equally interested in preventing the Africa from consummating the new attempt which she meditates, if not arrested, in your ports? Should she not be ordered to quit them? If not, of what value are the friendship and treaties which connect the people? What would you wish the French republic to think of the intentions of the Government of the United States, when, on the one hand, an English vessel exercising an open robbery in the waters of your States, enjoys an asylum, an hospitality, due only to friends? And, on the other, a French ship of war comes into your ports under the guarantee of the law of nations, of your neutrality, and of our treaties, is arrested and seized in contempt of these same treaties, when the law of nations, the honor of the United States, are attainted to by the English who insult them; and when our treaties are violated, for the purpose of satisfying the indiscriminate demand of a single individual.

That the new treaty connecting the United States with England cannot weaken ours, you have assured me, sir; you have told me that the intentions of the President were firm in this respect, and I have never doubted it. That treaty, you have always affirmed, cannot destroy the good dispositions of the American Government towards France. Are those dispositions and your promises ineffectual? I cannot believe it. I rather flatter myself that the present circumstances will convince me that I am not deceived, and that the republic will have a positive proof of that friendship of which it has so often received assurances. In this persuasion, I flatter myself that you will take the necessary measures in order to prevent the Africa from using your ports as a station whence to cruise on the French frigate Medusa. Referring, moreover, to my letters of the 9th, 11th, and 18th August (old style) I reiterate to you my application as to the corvette le Cassius, arrested in your ports in violation of our treaties, and I notify you that, if I do not speedily obtain justice, I shall abandon this vessel to the American Government, to its risk, reserving the right to future claim, and I shall refer the matter to my Government.

Accept, sir, &c.

No. 157.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of War, charged with the Department of State, to Mr. Adet, Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Department of State, September 5, 1795.

Sir:

On the 25th ultimo I had the honor to inform you (in answer to your letter of the 19th) that the violation of the laws of nations by the British ship of war Africa, in the instance to which you referred, had engaged the attention of the Government of the United States; at the same time mentioning some circumstances which might have caused delays.

To maintain the character of fairness and impartiality with which the President desired that all the acts of his administration might be marked, he was willing to allow full time for any representations and explanations which Captain Home, the commander of the Africa, might think proper to make: that time has elapsed, and none have been received. On the contrary, some recent acts show that he has repeated his aggressions. The President has, therefore, now determined to pursue such measures as are in his power to vindicate the sovereignty and rights of the United States. And as a principal aggression was committed by Captain Home, in the attempt made to take your predecessor, Mr. Fauchet, and his papers, it is just that you should receive the information I am going to communicate.

Governor Fenner is desired to transmit to Captain Home the demand of the President of the United States, that he immediately remove from a station within their jurisdiction, where he has violated, and continues to violate, their rights. The Governor is also desired to make known to Captain Home that, after forty-eight hours from the time this requisition shall be communicated to him, all intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the ship under his command will be forbidden.

Further, a full statement of the conduct of that officer will be transmitted to the minister of the United States at London, to be laid before the British Government for the purpose of obtaining reparation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Timothy Pickering.

No. 158.

Mr. Pickering to the Governor of Rhode Island.

Department of State, September 5, 1795.

Sir:

The President of the United States, ever desirous of manifesting the fairness and impartiality of his administration, was not, in haste to decide upon the conduct of Captain Roddam Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, for his violation of the sovereignty of the United States, as represented in the protest of Thomas Bliss, master of the sloop Peggy, sailing within the jurisdiction and under the flag of the United States; and for the menace and insulting demands in his letter of the 31st of July, addressed to Thomas William Moore, Esq. His Britannic Majesty's vice consul in Rhode Island, and by him communicated to your excellency. Representations on this subject were made to His Britannic Majesty's minister, and since his departure, to his chargé des affaires, with an intimation of the President's intention to wait a reasonable time for the counter representation of Captain Home, and such explanations from him and Mr. Moore as they should think proper to offer. That time has elapsed, and no satisfactory explanations have been given; on the contrary, it appears that Captain Home is continuing his aggressions. The President has therefore decided on the measures which his duty requires him to take, to vindicate the sovereignty and rights of the United States.

In pursuance of this determination, I am now to desire your excellency to communicate to the illustrious and Captain Rodham Home, the demand of the President of the United States, that he immediately remove from a station within the jurisdiction of the United States, where he has violated, and continues to violate, their rights; and that he forthwith liberate the three seamen, to wit: William Jones, John Caton, and George White, whom, with an armed force, he, on the 9th of the last month, seized and took from on board the ship Anne, John Tillinghast, master, then sailing within the jurisdiction of the United States, and carried on board the said ship Africa, where they are detained. I am also to request your excellency to make known to him, the said Captain Home, that after forty-eight hours from the time these requisitions shall be communicated to him, all intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the ship under his command will be forbidden. Those only can claim the rights of hospitality who respect its character. To such, of whatever nation, the President desires, with perfect impartiality, to render and secure all those accommodations and advantages to which they are entitled from the United States.

I have the honor to enclose an act of the President, by which he has revoked the exequatur formerly granted to Mr. Moore as vice consul at Rhode Island, and to request your excellency to cause the same to be published.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 159.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Thomas William Moore.

Department of State, September 5, 1795.

Sir:—It having been ascertained that, on the 20 of August, 1795, you transmitted to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island a letter, dated the 31st of July, addressed to you by Captain Rodham Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, the contents whereof you saw were highly indecent and unjustifiable: as unrestrained by the respect you owed the Government by whose permission you exercised your office, you have thus co-operated with Captain Home in groundless attacks on the United States; and the President has thought proper that you should be permitted to exercise the functions or powers of a vice consul within the United States.

You will, therefore, receive enclosed a copy of the letters patent which have been issued for the revoking the exequatur, heretofore granted to you, and which will be made public.

I am, sir, &c.

No. 160.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all whom it may concern.

Thomas William Moore, Esquire, having heretofore produced to me his commission as vice consul of His Britannic Majesty, within the State of Rhode Island, and having thereon received from me an exequatur, bearing date the 5th day of December, 1793, recognizing him as such, and declaring him free to exercise, within the said State, such functions and powers as may be given or permitted, by the laws of the land, to the consuls of nations, between whom and the United States no treaty or convention exists for permitting specific powers and functions to be exercised by their consuls reciprocally: And the said Thomas William Moore having, on the second day of August, 1795, transmitted to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island a letter, dated the 31st of July, 1795, addressed to him, the said Thomas William Moore, and written by Captain Rodham Home, commander of the British ship of war Africa, then lying at or near the port of Newport, in said State; which said letter is conceived in terms of menace and insult against the authority of the United States: And the said Thomas William Moore having participated in the commission of the said menace and insult, by transmitting the letter as before mentioned, having perfect knowledge of its contents: And it being no longer proper, and consistent with the respect due to the standing of the President of the United States, and authority of the United States, that the said Thomas William Moore should continue to exercise any of the functions or powers heretofore allowed, in virtue of his said commission as vice consul: These are, therefore, to declare, that I do no longer recognize the said Thomas William Moore as vice consul of His Britannic Majesty in any part of these United States, nor permit him to exercise any of the functions or powers heretofore granted; and I hereby wholly revoke the said exequatur heretofore given, and do declare the same to be absolutely void from this day forward.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States of America to be hereunto affixed. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the fifth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and of the independence of the United States of America the twentieth.

By the President's command,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Monroe.

Department of State, September 14, 1795.

Sir:—Before this letter reaches you, unofficial information will probably get to hand of the outrage committed by the British man of war the Africa, commanded by Captain Rodham Home, in his attempt to take Mr. Fauchet and his papers, on his passage from New York down the sound to Newport, where he was to embark for France in the frigate Medusa. The station taken by the Africa, in the waters of the State of Rhode Island, seems to have suggested to the people at Newport the idea that she intended to intercept Mr. Fauchet. An express was, therefore, sent to Stonington in Connecticut, where the sloop, in which Mr. Fauchet had embarked, was detained by contrary winds, to warn him of his danger. He then quitte the sloop, and taking his valuable papers with him, pursued his journey by land.

Captain Home made the expected attempt. The sloop was brought to, and two officers of the Africa went on board to search and take Mr. Fauchet, or his papers, or both—Captain Home, it seems, said the object was to take his papers only; and, accordingly, finding that those of value had been landed with Mr. Fauchet, the rest were returned unopened. The particulars of this action are stated in the deposition of Captain Thomas Bliss, the master of the packet in which Mr. Fauchet had embarked, of which a copy is enclosed. You will also find enclosed the copy of an insolent letter from Captain Home for the Governor of Rhode Island, to be conveyed through the British vice consul, Mr. Moore, who was so indiscreet, and so little respected the dignity of our Government, as to send the Governor the contents of it.

The evidences of the outrage and insulting conduct of Captain Home, with the co-operation of Mr. Moore, were communicated to the British minister and chargé des affaires, and the expectations of Government of reparation announced. For this purpose, and to give opportunity for counter-representations and explanations, time was necessary. Time accordingly was given: for justice as well as prudence required an observation of the maxim, Audi alteram partem.

After a reasonable time had elapsed, and no satisfactory explanations or counter proofs being offered, the President decided to the measure of retaliatory reparation. These you will find in the enclosed letter to Governor Fenner. Besides which, the minister of the United States in London is charged "fully to represent these outrages of Captain Home, and to press for such reparation as the nature of the case authorizes the President to demand. What this should be, it was not necessary to specify. The President relies that His Britannic Majesty will duly estimate the injuries and insults proved to have been committed by Captain Home against the United States, and inflict upon him such exemplary punishment as his aggrieved offences deserve; as the violated rights of a sovereign State require: and as it will become the justice and honor of His Majesty's Government to impose."

The letter beforementioned to Governor Fenner was sent from Philadelphia, by the post, on Saturday the fifth instant, when it bears date. On the Monday following, intelligence was received that the Medusa had sailed on the first, and that the Africa, in two or three hours afterwards, got under way to pursue her. I am particular in stating the days when the President's orders to Governor Fenner were despatched, and when the first intelligence reached Philadelphia that the Medusa had sailed, because it is not improbable that the suspension of those orders may be represented as calculated to be ineffectual; and it may be suggested that they were not issued finally until it was known that the Africa had left the waters of Rhode Island. But the facts are as I have stated them; and the true and only causes of the suspension are those which I have mentioned, and which you will see in the letter to Governor Fenner.

The circumstances, in respect to wind and weather, under which the Medusa sailed, joined with her swift sailing, enabled her to escape from the Africa, which has since returned to her former station at Rhode Island. The President's orders, prohibiting all intercourse with her, will now come into operation; and for her additional violation of the rights of a neutral nation, in immediately pursuing the Medusa, a new demand of satisfaction will be made on the British Government. A naval force to compel a due respect to our rights on the water you know we do not possess.

I have the pleasure to inform you that peace with all the Indians on our frontiers is at length accomplished. Georgia and the Southwestern territory have, for some months past, enjoyed tranquillity; and the most prejudiced against the Creeks believe their pacification sincere. On the third of August, General Wayne concluded a treaty with all the Western Indians. This fact is declared in a letter of that date from the Quartermaster General at head quarters, to his deputy, Major Craig, at Pittsburg. So I rely upon it. I suppose General Wayne must have sent off the official account with the treaty by one of his aids, whose arrival I daily expect.

The Medusa has been taken of Presqu' Isle, where some works are now erecting, for the protection of the inhabitants, and the security of our commerce.

But for the vexations on our commerce by the belligerent Powers, (for they are not confined to the British) we should enjoy perfect repose, amidst unexampled prosperity.

I am, very respectfully, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

SIR: The following is a copy of a letter I received from Captain Home, of His Britannic Majesty's ship Africa, which I take the most early opportunity of forwarding to your excellency.

No. 163.

AFRICA, OFF RHODE ISLAND, July 31, 1795.

SIR: I did expect to have the pleasure of seeing you on board the Africa, but as that is not the case, I am obliged to send an officer to you, under the present circumstances, and to desire that you will lay my letter before the Governor, or other chief magistrate of this island, which is to contain these several requests.

First, that there may be delivered up to me, immediately, an officer who was taken out of a British sloop, while in Newport, and confined on board the French frigate now in Rhode Island; this violent proceeding being contrary to the law of all nations in a neutral port. In the second place, that you may receive the aid of the civil power in this Island, to send on board the Africa all British seamen, and others, who have been captured in any vessels, and set at liberty in these States: not a leagued and pretended aid, but such as our nation have a right to expect from the United States, with whom we are at peace and amity. And, thirdly, that I may be permitted to buy such refreshments as my ship's company are in need of; and that, in case I send my own boats on shore, my people and officers shall not be liable to insult from any of the inhabitants, or other, of whatever description, and to receive a copy of a letter to the Governor, that my officers who carries this, or any other officer who may send on their just and lawful occasions, receive from any one individual, whether in the nature of a mob or otherwise, any affront or insult, I will immediately, on my part, come in with His Majesty's ship under my command, and protect my own people. And further, that if the Government or States here are, in such cases as is here mentioned, guilty of such a breach of neutrality, I will then look upon myself, in the same manner, as not bound to observe the neutrality of these ports; and that I am resolved to be treated in the same manner, in all respects whatever, as they do those of the French republic; and I am more plain in the nature of my present demands, as I have received a letter, that, if I send my people on shore, I shall not be received in that manner. In this case I want to spy nothing. I am in full possession of every intelligence, regarding that ship, which I want to be possessed of. And I require a written answer from the Governor of Rhode Island to these demands, and that without loss of time.

I am, sir, &c.

RODHAM HOME.

His Brit. Maj. Vice Consul, Rhode Island.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, &c.

The preceding contains a true copy of an original letter from Thomas Wm. Moore, and of a copy of Rodham Home's letter to him accompanying it, duly compared.

Witness,

HENRY WARD, Secretary.
The President has been an early and decided friend of the French Revolution; and whatever reason there may have been, under our ignorance of facts and policy, to suspend an opinion upon some of its important transactions, you will not have the wishes which this momentous subject opens to the minds of great men to meddle with its interior arrangements; and persuaded that success will attend their efforts; and particularly, that union among themselves is an impregnable barrier against external assaults.

How the French Government, when it shall be no longer attacked by foreign arms, will ultimately settle, is a matter of considerable concern to us. Our全国人民's opinions are not formed from Bifiit's eye, nor do they spring from the President's. You have heard the old order of things to this day, and the fluctuation and mutual destruction of parties, forbid a minister of a foreign country to attach himself to any as such, and dictate to him not to incline to any set of men, further than they appear to go with the sense of the nation.

When the executive provisional council recalled Mr. Genet, they expressed a determination to render it a matter of eclat, as you have seen, and at the same time disavowed all his offensive acts. Nothing having been forwarded to us, relative to Mr. Norris, which requires a disavowal, you will, if you should be interrogated as to any particular feeling of the President towards the said Mr. Norris, be instructed from the Secretary of State to Mr. Fauchet, as explanatory of the President's promptness to comply with their demand.

From Mr. Genet and Fauchet we have uniformly learned, that France did not desire us to depart from neutrality; and it would have been unwise to have asked us to do otherwise: for our ports are open to her prizes, while they are shut to the arms of the British and those of Great Britain's allies. When you, with so much complaisance, were we at war, as they can even now, notwithstanding the British instructions; and as they may be, if the demands to be made on Great Britain should succeed. We have, therefore, pursued neutrality with faithfulness; we have paid the expenses of the Treaty, of which the Treaty asserts, that it should have been paid more, if the state of our affairs did not require us to be prepared with funds to meet the personal event of war. We mean to continue the same line of conduct in future; and to remove all jealousy with respect to Mr. Jay's mission to London, you may say, that he is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and France.

If you should be able to comprehend this head, suspicions of various kinds. But you must declare the motives of that mission to be, to obtain immediate compensation for our plundered property, and restitution of the posts. You may intimate, by way of argument, but without ascribing it to the Government, that, if way should be necessary, the effects of the people of the United States towards it, would be better secured by a manifestation that everything has been done to avoid it; and that the British nation would be divided, when they found that we had been forced into it. This may be briefly touched upon as the path of prudence with respect to ourselves; and also with respect to France, since we are unable to give her aids of men or money. To this matter you cannot be too anxious and ample justice, and repelling with any imitation of the most distant intention to sacrifice our connexion with France to any demand you shall have from England. You will, in the capacity of the President, be imbued with this intelligence. You will have it signified abroad that he is averse to admit into his public room, which is free to all the world besides, any Frenchmen who are obnoxious to the French republic; although, perhaps, it may again happen sometimes, as many go thither, whose character is not known.

It is very probable that our country will become the asylum for most of the French who expatriate themselves from their native land. Our laws have never yet made a distinction of persons, nor is such a distinction very easy. Hence some of those who are perhaps attainted in France, have thrown themselves upon the protection of the United States; and it is surely very hazardous to be misconstrued into any estrangement from the French cause. You will explain this, whenever it shall be necessary.

If you may judge from what has been at different times uttered by Mr. Fauchet, he will represent the existence of truth, without incurring any unanswerable consequences to each other. One republican, and friendly to the French revolution; the other, monarchical, aristocratic, Britannic, and anti-Gallic: that a majority of the House of Representatives, the people, and the President, are in the first class; and a majority of the Senate in the second. If this intelligence should be used, in order to inspire a distrust of our good will to France, you will industriously obviate such an effect; and if a fair understanding with the French minister himself, that the French nation, what is desired by France, will be by a plain and candid application to the Government, and not by those insidious operations, on the people, which Genet endeavored to carry on.

The information which we possess of France, before and in the early stages of the Revolution, must be considerably altered at this day. You will, therefore, transmit to us, as soon as possible, an account of the navy, the agriculture, and the commerce of France. It is desirable, too, to know upon what footing religion really stands. These, however, are general objects. But we are particularly concerned to understand the true state of the different sects of politicians. Are there any of the old friends to the ancient regime remaining? Are any new friends created by the course of things? Are the Brissotines extinguished? Are the Dantonists overwhelmed? Is Robespierre's party firmly fixed? Is he capable, from talents and personal fortitude, to direct the storm? Is his character free from imputation, as to money? Is he friendly to the United States? How is the executive power administered now? What are the principal measures? What is the true and actual state of the two armies? The number of troops and of the several commissions of administration, which have been lately established, bear to that committee? What is the true cause of the various changes, which have lately taken place, by one party rising upon the ruins of another? What appears to be the true and sure means of preventing the defections, which may arise? If the despotism of the French nation, and their firstatries to see things in a true light. For without doubting the solidity of the French cause, we ought not to be unprepared for any event. If, therefore, any very momentous turn should arise in French affairs, upon which the conduct of our Government may depend, you need not hesitate at the expense of an advice boat, if no other satisfactory communication can be had of it. In that case, you are authorized to communicate it to the President, and send the transactions of it, and embrace every proper conveyance, by duplicate, and, in great cases, even by triplicate.

Should you be interrogated about the treaty of commerce, you may reply that it has never been proposed to us by Mr. Morris. If you have any thing else to communicate, you will express yourself not to be instructed, nor among a subject to be negotiated with the Government here.

In like manner, if a treaty of alliance, or if the execution of the guarantee of the French Islands, by force of arms, should be proposed, you will refer the republic of France to this side of the water. In short, you are expected, with a care and prudence on your discretion, that you will not commit the United States, by any specific declarations, except where you are particularly instructed, and except too in giving testimony of our attachment to their cause.

There is reason to believe that the embargo, when it was first laid, excited some uneasy sensations in the breast of the French minister. For it so happened that, at the moment before its operation, pretty considerable shipments of flour were made to the British West Indies, and a snow, called La Camille, laden with flour, for France, was arrested near Newcastle, on the Delaware, after she had quitted the port of Philadelphia. But you know enough of this history to declare that the embargo was leveled against Great Britain, and was made general merely because, if it had been partial against her, it would have amounted to a cause of war; and, also, that it was not meant to be detrimental to commerce, but to the French and the American citizen.

It may be that the higher officers of the French government were not aware of the probable consequences of the embargo; but it is perfectly certain that the minister in England was aware of the proper means of gaining our friendship. He has thought it his duty to bring this subject before you, and to exhibit the general interests of commerce.
to appoint a vice consul under himself, and probably went no farther than to constitute him an agent, as consuls may lawfully do. Mr. Dolbear, having succeeded Mr. Carnes, will probably take similar measures with respect to an agent; but it is desirable that you should immediately examine this matter well, and cause to be done what shall appear proper in that behalf.

If a vice consul should appear to be really necessary, you will inform me by the first opportunity.

Mr. G. Morris having recommended Mr. Francis Collyn to be our consul at Dunkirk, a temporary commission is submitted to him, and will be sent to the Senate for renewal, unless, from a view of all circumstances relative to his situation, he shall be found to be inferior in any respect to the French consuls. We have no doubt, however, but you will have judged of the fitness and capability of Mr. Collyn, to whom you would not have sent a commission, if you did not think it proper that he should be employed in the service of the United States.

Mr. G. Morris will have probably communicated to you the steps which he has lately taken to accomplish a peace with Algiers, and the liberation of our fellow citizens in captivity. But, lest he may have accidentally omitted to add some thing which you may wish to know, I shall not be backward a certain day or two, after he shall have reached you, to make a succinct report of what has been done upon this head, and is not minute in that letter, as to the instructions which he has given, we are left to conjecture what course has been pursued. You will, therefore, inform the proper authority that the President learns, with the highest satisfaction, that the French minister has arrived at the port of New York, and is about to be received by the President of the United States; not doubting, at the same time, that it must prove beneficial to the supplies of France from hence, that the powers derived from Mr. Morris to the agent who was to accompany, on our part, the French commissioner, though they are, as yet, unknown to us, have, no doubt, been judicious, and the acts, in conformity with those powers, will be found, when they shall be known, to have been performed with a regard both to the French and to the American interests. Our minister at Lisbon, has been long ago specially appointed to this business, possesses a full knowledge of our views and means, and has been particularly conversant in a perpetual sense for peace with Algiers; that he will, if he should think it necessary, instruct the agent appointed by Mr. Morris, that we trust the auspices of the French republic will be continued to the efforts under the guidance of Colonel Humphreys; and that, as an evidence of our confidence in the French Government, you are empowered, if you conceive it to be advisable, to impart the terms upon which we expect to buy peace; but the circumstances and consequences of such communication are to be well weighed before it be made.

The cases of spoliations and vexation from the French cruisers on our trade, I again most earnestly recommend to your anxious attention. Mr. Fauchet has promised to forward a recommendation of them to his Government. You will do well to press the principle without delay, and that doubt be entertained as to facts, put the subjects into a more active period. The decision is easy, if the truth be known from the citizens; and that we have greatly suffered by their plundering, the papers accompanying this letter, if they be true. We are no less disturbed at the conduct concerning the embargo at Bordeaux. If the account brought home, is even partly true, by one of the captains who were detained there, he gives us the promise of compensation has been illusive only. You are, therefore, again charged to make this also your special and immediate business; and to press the rights of our citizens in a manner which indicates that we cannot waive the justice due to us. In short, sir, is the express instruction of the President that you diligently inquire into every inconvenience to which our trade has been subjected, and to remonstrate strongly upon them, and represent the facts to us fully and minutely. I hope not Mr. Morris so strenuously pressed the affair of the ship Laurens, which is committed to your care, I would here relate all the circumstances. But these may be obtained as well from Mr. Morris as from the French archives. The decrees upon which the conduct of the French republic was founded, in this case, which I note particularly, on account of these decrees, have also been remonstrated against by Mr. Morris; and I question whether so much matter can be added to his observations. But such of those decrees as tend to the condemnation of the Laurens are gross violations of our rights. You, no doubt, will have resumed this subject immediately on your arrival, and you will, as also by the President, be addressed to the respective courts of France and America, in order to weaken the friendship between the two countries. As you carried with you a statement from this Department relative to the spoliations of our trade, and copies of Mr. Fauchet’s letters respecting them, I do not repeat them here. But these will assist you in the demands which you are to make on the French Government.

I am, &c.

EMI. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 11, 1794.

SIR: On the 31st ultimo I arrived at Havre, and, on the 2d instant, at this place. Mr. Morris was, upon my arrival, from town, but he came in as soon as advised of it. By him I was presented to the commissary of foreign affairs, who assured me that, as soon as the form of my reception should be settled, he would apprise me of it, but that I could only be received by some of his assistants. I was not informed of the late commotion of Robespierre, as from the necessity of making some general regulation in that respect, it being the first instance in which a minister had been addressed to the republic. I assured him I should write at pleasure, and I told him it was with great satisfaction that I learned that the subject was under consideration of the committee of public safety, and will probably be concluded in a day or two.

I heard, at Havre, of the crimes and execution of Robespierre, Sr. Just, Couthon, and others of that party, and should have written to you on the subject; but that period passed before I could give you the information of the arrest, varying, perhaps, in every sea port town, and which might reach you before my letter. I hastened, therefore, to Paris, in the hope of acquiring there immediately more correct information of facts, as well as of the causes which gave birth to them; but, even yet, I suspect I am on the surface only, for it will take some time to become well acquainted with the state of affairs which are so extensive and important.

That Robespierre and his associates merit their fate is a position to which every one assents. It was proclaimed by the counsellers and voices of all whom I met and conversed with from Havre to Paris. In the latter place I was seized with a happy foreboding for the destinies of those persons whom we have so long been became indispensable. It is generally agreed that, from the period of Danton’s fall, Robespierre had amassed in his own hands all the powers of the Government, and controlled every department in all its operations. It was his spirit which ruled the committee of public safety, the Convention, and the revolutionary tribunal. The Convention was soon founded, and Robespierre became the direction of the armies, &c; to the latter the interior securities, &c. I have been respectively told, and render an account, monthly, of their transactions to the Convention. It was intended that these committees should be independent of each other, and both under the immediate control of the Convention; but, by the distribution of their powers, this design was defeated, for such an assemblage was thereby given to the presidents of public safety, and the other securities to the newer to be placed in these committees, and Robespierre, who was by far the most influential one, was assigned to the committee of public safety. It soon happened, in the course of the administration, that, besides the very extensive patronage, commissariat, weight and character, and immense state of revenue, he gained likewise an ascendency of the acceding of Convention, and of the committee of measures. Nor was the organization of the revolutionary tribunal more favorable to the independence of that branch, and, of course, to public and personal liberty. It was equally dependent on, and the creature of, this committee, Robespierre, therefore, had become omnipotent. It was his spirit which dictated every movement, and particularly the unceasing operation of the guillotine. Nor did a more bloody and merciless tyrant ever wield the rod of power. His acts of cruelty and oppress sion are, perhaps, without parallel in the annals of the Convention. It is generally conceded that, for some months before his fall, the list of prisoners was shown him, every evening, by the president of the revolutionary tribunal, and that he marked those who were to be the victims of the succeeding day, which he usually did in the presence of sixteen consuls and upon the imputation of conspiracies, &c. for the sole reason that some members had been more friendly to Brissot, Danton, &c., or had expressed a jealousy of his power. His oppression had, in fact, gained to such a height that a convolution because of it had been lately preceded by a nightly procession. Some make him the active party, and believe that he had arranged with the commissary and the guards of the city the plan of a general massacre of his enemies in the Convention. But I am of opinion that these projects, for they were certainly contemplated, proceeded from despair, and were adopted at the moment only as the last resource. This was the fact, which, having been intimated, some days before, by him or St. Just, that other conspiracies threatened the safety of the republic, and which ought to be laid open. The communication was given in such a manner as to satisfy the audience that he meant Tallien and some other members of the house. And, in fact, the next day, St. Just, proceeding to a denunciation of these members, if the power of Robespierre remained, it was well known that death and denunciation went hand in hand. To repel it by a counter one was the only remaining hope. It could, in no event, produce a worse effect. Tallien, therefore, rose, and accused Robespierre of the treachery of which St. Just had accused the men who were about to be denounced. "This time to draw the veil from perilly so flagrant." St. Just was silenced, and driven from the tribune. Robespierre ascended, and made many efforts to speak, in vain. The whole Convention rose, and cried out, with one voice, "Down with the tyrant!" He stood like one amazed and stiffened, staring at the Convention, with the suspicion equal to impending indignation and terror deprived of the power of utterance, but yet afraid to descend. As soon as the Convention saw his strength, he was arrested, and sent to the prisoner of public safety; but, by this time, his immediate cadetadors had taken the alarm, and were endeavoring to excite commotions in the city of Paris. Henriot, the commandant of the guard, with a few followers, pursued and rescued him from the common people, and with some effect; whilst Henriot, in the character of general, was busied in assembling the guards in the place before the hall of the Convention, with intention to fire on it. There was, at this moment, an awful pause in the Convention, and the public opinion was greatly alarmed. But the situation of the Convention was truly interesting. They knew that all the appointments were conferred by Robespierre, that he had been long deemed a traitor, and still possessed, by means of his opposition or terror, a wonderful influence over the citizens at large; and, more immediately in their presence, there was no one not Huawei fitly dignify, to whose duty on that great occasion. On the contrary, it displayed a degree of fortitude and magnanimity worthy of those who aspire to the exalted character of defenders of their country. It calmly entered upon the subject of defence; declared Robespierre no longer had the power; the last moment of his power was then, and his and his associates were taken at the same time to prison, and, on the next day, to execution, amidst the rejoicing and acclamation of the people.

Many believe that Robespierre aimed at despotic power, and sought to establish himself upon the throne of the Convention, in the character of protector, or some such character; and, in pursuit of this idea, say, that he counted upon the support of the armies, and particularly of the army of the north, and had otherwise arranged things in such order as to favor the project. What his views of ambition and courage were, I know not; that they had been great was certainly not believed. But the revolution and conjuration were not criminal, even where his influence was greatest, cannot be true, nor is it warranted by circumstances. If he was not promised the support, it is not probable he had such a scheme; and that it was not promised, must be obvious to those who take into view all the circumstances which merit consideration. It will be observed, by those who wish to form a just estimate of the future course and fortune of this revolution, that, from its commencement to the present time, no person ever raised himself to power by but the proof he had furnished of his attachment to the cause, by his efforts to promote it; and that, from the moment doubts were entertained of the solidity and purity of his principles, did his influence begin to decline in equal degree. This was seen in the movements of Lafayette's troops, though his other generals, were abandoned by the armies they commanded; the former compelled to seek refuge in a foreign country, and the latter in the camp of the enemy; and the others, though eminent in the civil department, were, upon like charges, condemned by the public voice to the same disgrace. The people has been :::d to the belief that Robespierre has been able to obstruct its course: on the contrary, it has swept every thing before it. Can it be presumed, then, and especially at this moment, when the arbiter of the nation, inflamed by conquest, is at the height, that any respectable number of citizens, of any description, would turn aside from the great object of the revolution, to countenance, in any individual, schemes of usurpation and tyranny? Did not the late event, even in Paris, dispose it, where Robespierre had most influence? There was no opposing force but what depended on public opinion, and every thing tended to favor his views.

From all circumstances, I am led to ascribe the sanguinary course of Robespierre's proceedings to a different cause. I consider the contest between him and Danton as a contest for power between rivals having the same political objects in view. The former was jealous of the latter; and having gained the ascendency, and the defective organization of the Government permitting it, by means of his influence in the judiciary, he cut Danton off, and, at last, gave the signal for the arrest and accusation of the latter, on that account, submitted to. The public, however, saw into the oppression, and disapproved of it; for, at the moment when Danton was led to execution, there was a general gloom upon the countenances of the citizens. They all attended at the place, in hope of hearing the explanation: they heard none, and retired. Robespierre, in the night following, was informed that morning an attempt had been made to obstruct their course: on the contrary, it has swept every thing before it. Can it be presumed, then, and especially at this moment, when the arbiter of the nation, inflamed by conquest, is at the height, that any respectable number of citizens, of any description, would turn aside from the great object of the revolution, to countenance, in any individual, schemes of usurpation and tyranny? Did not the late event, even in Paris, disprove it, where Robespierre had most influence? There was no opposing force but what depended on public opinion, and every thing tended to favor his views.

triumphancy that liberty it has so nobly contended for or will it not rather turn its victorious arms against the bosom of consanguinity? These are great and important questions, and to which my short presence here will not permit me to give satisfactory answers. Hereafter I shall be able to give you better information in these respects. At present I can only observe, that I have neither seen nor heard of any symptom of discontent showing itself among the people at large. The oppression of Robespierre had indeed created an uneasiness, but which disappeared with the cessation of his misrule; nor have I ever seen in the countenances of men more apparent content with the government we have than in that of the French, every where since my arrival. In the course of the last year the Convention recommended it to the people, as the surest means of support for their armies, to increase the sphere of cultivation, and from what I can learn, there was not more land under cultivation, nor was the country ever blessed with a more productive harvest. Many fathers of families, who formerly supported themselves and their families, have been compelled to sell the lands they held in order to reap and secure it; but the women, the boys, and the girls, even to tender age, have supplied their places, I saw this with amazement upon my route from Havre to this place, and am told it is generally the case. The victories of the French arms have been celebrated with joy and glory, and lately a day has latterly passed over witnessing a deputation to the Convention, and often from the poorest citizens, to throw into its coffers some voluntary contribution for the support of the war. These are not symptoms of disgust with the reigning Government, and of a desire to change it.

With respect to the present disposition of the army, or what it may be at the end of the war, I can say less, as I have not seen it. At present the best understanding subsists between it and the Convention. It is possible that, in the course of service, if the war should last long, many of its members may acquire habits unfriendly to retirement; but in an army composed of the yeomanry of the country, as this is, that sentiment will be less apt to gain ground than in other services. It is, I think, certain that the spirit which has animated and armed the people will continue to produce some effect, even in its final disposition. If, however, there should still remain a considerable force on foot, which could not be prevailed on to retire; fond of conquest, of rapine, and of plunder; can it be supposed that its parent country will furnish only the most grateful and generous place to act on? Will no other portion of Europe present before it a more productive field, whereon to gratify ambition, avarice, or revenge? There must always remain in the breasts of the soldiers some sentiment in favor of their relatives; and the fortunes of the wealthy will be pretty well broken and dissipated here by the course of the revolution. The example of the Roman conquerors, who have reared their leviathan on the bodies of the vanquished and fared abundantly on the fat and kindred armies fighting against each other, and tearing the commonwealth in pieces; but they make no allowance for the great difference in the state of things. The armies of the empire were raised in the conquered provinces, and composed of foreigners. They, therefore, had no attachment to France. The state of the country and the spirit of the age, I am happy to say, are very different. The disgruntlements were considerably mitigated by the rapidity of the events. But here the case is different: the armies are otherwise composed, and the spirit of the age, that of a rational and philosophical reform, seeking to establish the public liberty, and spewing before it old and vain forms of government which would not be tolerated. I have thus gone into this interesting subject from a desire to give the best view in my power of the late communications and present state of the internal affairs of this country, because I well know its importance to my own. It will be my object to improve my knowledge of it, and keep you correctly informed in every particular, and as regularly as opportunities offer.

With respect to the state of the war, I can only say, in general, that the armies of France have prevailed over the combined forces every where. The commencement of the campaign was favorable to them; but the action which took place in July, near Charleroy, on the plains of Fleurus, between Coulon, at the head of about one hundred and twenty thousand men, and the imperial forces and which terminated, after the severest conflict and great slaughter on both sides, in favor of the French arms, has evidently given them the superiority ever since. This was certainly one of the most important and bloody actions which has been fought in the course of the present war. Coulon, unwilling to retire before the republican troops, had gathered together all his forces, with design of giving a general action, and in the hope of regaining Charleroy. He attacked them at every point, about five in the morning, formed in the field, and ready to receive him. Three times he drove them back within their entrenchments, reluctant to yield the day: but they rallied out a fourth time, with still greater impetuosity, shouting through all their ranks, "we will retain no more!" and singing the Marsican hymn, and other patriotic songs, sufficient to excite an ardor which was irresistible. The attack succeeded. Coulon, with his routed army, fled before them, leaving on the field, according to the French accounts, about ten thousand slain. The French, it is supposed, lost about fifteen thousand men. They had taken, in the course of the present campaign, Namur, Tournay, Tingleff, Louvain, Ghent, Comines, Bruges, Quaerum, Louges, Liege, Nieuport, Cadoudal, (at the mouth of the Scheldt) with some other places lying in that quarter. Coulon at present occupies the ground in the neighborhood of Maestricht, and endeavors to cover the frontier of Holland. It is, however, daily expected another action will take place, which may be decisive. In the fate of the war, I cannot give any information; you are left in the rear; they are yet possessed by the combined forces, but are invested, and it is thought will soon fall. Their success in Spain has likewise been great. They are, in possession, at present, of the whole of the province of Guipuscoa, Bilboa excepted. Many prisoners and immense parks of artillery have been taken from the Spanish service, and they give reason to hope great and kind results in that quarter. There has been but one sea action, and which was between the French and English fleets, in the course of the present summer. The French had twenty-six ships, and the English twenty-eight. The English, having the wind, bore down the French, and separated seven ships from the rest, which took sail and sunk, and the French whose continued to produce some effect, even in its final disposition. If, however, there should still remain a considerable force on foot, which could not be prevailed on to retire; fond of conquest, of rapine, and of plunder; can it be supposed that its parent country will furnish only the most grateful and generous place to act on? Will no other portion of Europe present before it a more productive field, whereon to gratify ambition, avarice, or revenge? The attack succeeded. Coulon, with his routed army, fled before them, leaving on the field, according to the French accounts, about ten thousand slain. The French, it is supposed, lost about fifteen thousand men. They had taken, in the course of the present campaign, Namur, Tournay, Tingleff, Louvain, Ghent, Comines, Bruges, Quaerum, Louges, Liege, Nieuport, Cadoudal, (at the mouth of the Scheldt) with some other places lying in that quarter. Coulon at present occupies the ground in the neighborhood of Maestricht, and endeavors to cover the frontier of Holland. It is, however, daily expected another action will take place, which may be decisive. In the fate of the war, I cannot give any information; you are left in the rear; they are yet possessed by the combined forces, but are invested, and it is thought will soon fall. Their success in Spain has likewise been great. They are, in possession, at present, of the whole of the province of Guipuscoa, Bilboa excepted. Many prisoners and immense parks of artillery have been taken from the Spanish service, and they give reason to hope great and kind results in that quarter. There has been but one sea action, and which was between the French and English fleets, in the course of the present summer. The French had twenty-six ships, and the English twenty-eight. The English, having the wind, bore down the French, and separated seven ships from the rest, which took sail and sunk, and the French whose sions. I therefore addressed a letter to the President of the Convention, of which the enclosed, No. 1, is a copy, and was happy to find it was well received; for it was immediately taken, by a member present, to the committee of public safety, by whom a report was made in two hours afterwards to the Convention, and a decree adopted by the latter body, of which No. 3 is a copy, for my reception by the Convention itself at two the following day. I deemed it my duty to avail myself of this opportunity to dissipate, if possible, by the documents in my possession, impressions which had been made, and were still making, of the unfriendly disposition of the American Government towards the liberty and happiness of the French nation. At the same time, therefore, that I presented my credentials, I laid before the Convention the declarations of the Senate and House of Representatives, as conveyed by the President through the Secretary of State, with an assurance that I was authorized to declare that the President was actuated by similar sentiments. The communication was received in a manner very interesting, and which furnished, at the same time, the strongest proof of the affection entertained by the French nation for the United States of America. The enclosed, No. 3, is a copy of my address to the Convention, and of the President's answer. Every department has since shown the strongest disposition to prove its attachment to their ally, by embracing every opportunity which the slightest incident has offered. A few stores bought for the accommodation of my family, in the ship which I sailed, were arrested by the custom-house, because not known to be the property of the captain. This was casually heard by the committee of public safety, and, without any intimation from me, by their order restored. But being desirous more formally to testify their regard, the commissary of foreign affairs announced to me yesterday, that he was instructed, in the name of the President, to appropriate a house for my use, as minister of the United States, of such accommodations and in such part of the city as I would designate. The enclosed No. 4 is a copy of his letter and of my reply. These latter acts, it is true, may be deemed in some measure acts of ceremony. So far, however, as they furnish any indication of the disposition of this country towards our own, it is a favorable one.

I found here many officers, who were taken at sea and brought in, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce. I intend immediately to make an effort to have that order rescinded, and compensation rendered for the injury sustained. I have written to Mr. Fenwick, who is best acquainted with the affair of the Bordeaux embargo, to request his attendance here, or to forward such documents as will enable me to pursue, with suitable information, the interest of those who were affected by it. And I shall likewise bring forward, at the same time, the claims of others of our citizens for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo.

The position of the armies is nearly the same as when I wrote you last. No action has been fought, nor any other material change taken place since.

A perfect tranquility, too, continues to reign throughout the republic. The execution of Robespierre and his associates has produced the same effect everywhere. Every person seems to be freed from an oppression which was created by the fear of the authority of France, and covered with the mask of patriotism. It is, however, said, that others, who have been equally guilty, (for Robespierre, who was a timid man, could not have made the majority of the committee vote against their own opinion) will, probably, yet be brought to justice. Of this I shall be the better informed, if you will furnish me with further information. The revolution, which I suggested in my last, contemplated in the organization of the committees and revolutionary tribunal, is now completed, or nearly so. I will enclose you copies of the decrees in my next. A great number of prisoners have been discharged, who were confined here and in other parts of the republic, in consequence of a decree that those should be liberated who were committed upon suspicion only. It was, however, greatly unfortunate that Robespierre was not cut off sooner, for it is most certain that his last days were stained with some of the innocent blood of the republic.

The vice consul has not yet arrived, and, to be candid, I doubt, when he does, whether he will be received or not. A native of this country is, at the present moment, unable to render any service to our own, although he may have always resided here, and his political principles been unquestionable. But one who has been absent is considered, if not an emigrant, at best indifferent, and perhaps unfriendly, to the revolution, and therefore odious.

If this gentleman has arrived, I think it probable he is confined at the part where he landed. I deem this unfortunate for the commercial business which properly belongs to the consular department here; as all the commercial affairs of the republic are transacted here.

No. 1.

Mr. Monroe to the President and Representatives of the French People in Convention assembled.

PARIS, August 14th, 1794.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT:

Having lately arrived here, with authority from the President of the United States of America to represent those States in quality of minister plenipotentiary with the French republic, and not knowing the competent department to which I belonged, nor having the blessings of the precaution. I have thought it my duty to make known my mission immediately to the representatives of the nation. To them it belongs to fix the day, and prescribe the mode, by which I shall be acknowledged as the representative of their ally and sister republic. They will, therefore, have the goodness to designate to me the Department to which I shall present myself, to be recognized in the character I bear.

I make to you this communication with the greater pleasure, because it gives me an opportunity, not only to testify to the representatives of the free citizens of France, my own devotion to the cause of liberty, but of assuring them, at the same time, and in the most solemn manner, of the profound interest which the Government and People of America take in the liberty, the success, and prosperity, of the French republic.

No. 2.

The following decree was passed by the Convention:

Art. 1. The minister plenipotentiary of the United States shall be introduced into the bosom of the Convention, to-morrow, at two o'clock, P. M., he shall then explain the object of his mission, and, after which, the President shall salute him fraternaly, in testimony of the friendship which unites the American and French people.

Art. 2. The President of the Convention shall write a letter to the President of the United States, and transmit to him the process verbal of this sitting.

No. 3.

The following address was presented by Mr. Monroe, the day following:

CITIZENS: In the name of the French People and of the Free Citizens of the French Republic.

My admission into this assembly, in presence of the French nation, (for all the citizens of France are represented here) to be recognized as the representative of the American republic, impresses me with a degree of sensibility which I cannot express. I am conscious of the obligations of that friendship and regard which the French nation has always shown to their ally, the United States of America.
The following communications from the Department of State were, at the same time, delivered by Mr. Monroe:

To the Committee of Public Safety of the French republic.

Philadelphia, June 10th, 1794.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States of America, has the honor of communicating to the committee of public safety for the French republic that, on the 24th day of April, 1794, it was unanimously resolved, by the House of Representatives, as follows:—

"That the letter of the committee of public safety of the French republic, addressed to Congress, be transmitted to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to answer on behalf of this House, in terms expressive of their sensibility for the friendly and affectionate manner in which they have addressed the Congress of the United States, with an unequivocal assurance that the Representatives of the People of the United States have much interest in the happiness and prosperity of the French republic."—

The President of the United States has caused this honorable communication to be transmitted to the Department of State. In no manner can it be more properly discharged, than by seizing the occasion of declaring to the ally of the United States, that the cause of liberty, in the defence of which so much American blood and treasure have been lavished, is cherished by our republican freedom, and that the successes of those who stand forth as her avengers, will be gloried in by the United States, and will be felt as the successes of ourselves and the other friends of humanity.

Yes, representatives of our ally, your communication has been addressed to those who share in your fortunes, and who take a deep interest in the happiness and prosperity of the French republic.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Answer of M. de Donau, President of the Convention, to Mr. Monroe.

The French people have not forgotten that it is to the American people they owe their initiation into the cause of liberty. It was in admiring the sublime insurrection of the American people against Britain, once so haughty, but now so humbled; it was in taking, themselves, arms to second your courageous efforts, and in cementing your independence by the blood of our brave warriors, that the French people learned, in their turn, to break the sceptre of tyranny, and to elevate the statue of liberty on the wreck of a throne, supported, during fourteen centuries, only by crimes and by corruption.

How, then, should it happen that we should not be friends? Why should we not associate the mutual means of prosperity that our commerce and navigation offer to two people freed by each other? But it is not merely a diplomatic alliance—it is the sweetest fraternity, and the most frank, at the same time, that must unite us—this it is that indeed unites us; and this union shall be forever indissoluble, as it will forever the dread of tyrants, the safeguard of liberty, the world, and the preserver of all the social and philanthropic virtues.

In bringing to us, citizen, the pledge of this union, so dear to us, it could not fail to be received with the liveliest emotions. It is now five years since an usurper of the sovereignty of the people would have received you with the pride which belongs alone to vice; and he would have thought it much to have given to the minister of a free people some tokens of an insolent protection. But, to-day, the sovereign people themselves, by the organ of their rightful representatives, receive you; and you see the tenderness, the effusion of soul, that accompanies this simple and touching ceremony. I am impatient to give you the fraternal embrace, which I am ordered to give in the name of the French people. Conceived, above all, in the name of the American people, and let this spectacle complete the annihilation of an impious coalition of tyrants.
The Commissary of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 4th Fructidor, 24th year of the republic.

CITIZEN:—

After having received the representative of our ally with the most distinguished marks of affection, the Government of the republic desires to do every thing which depends on it to make his residence in France agreeable to him. With this view the committee of public safety authorizes me to offer you, in the name of the republic, a national pension; and I desire, in making the offer, therefore, to make known to you my intentions in this respect; as, likewise, to designate the quarter which will be most agreeable to you.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Commissary of Foreign Relations for the French republic.

PARIS, August 22, 1794.

CITIZEN:—

I was favored yesterday with yours of that date, informing me that the committee of public safety had authorized you, in the name of the republic, to appropriate a house for my use, as minister of their ally, the United States, and had assigned you the character of a public agent, to which I should desire to have received it with a comportment peculiar satisfaction, because I consider it as a proof of the sincere regard which the committee entrate for their ally, whose servant I am. But, upon this occasion, I am not permitted to indulge, in any respect, my own opinion or feelings. The constitution of my country, an extract from which is here annexed, has prescribed a line of conduct to me, and which it is my duty to follow. The committee of public safety, and you, citizen, respect too highly the fundamental laws of your own country not to approve my reason for declining the kind offer; you have made me. I shall, however, immediately communicate it to our Government, and doubt not it will produce there the good effect it merits.

Extract from the Constitution of the United States.

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State."

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, September 15, 1794.

SIR:

As soon as I could command a moment's leisure, I applied myself to the immediate duties of my station. I found many of my countrymen here, laboring under embarrassments of a serious kind, growing out of the war, and was soon furnished with like complaints from others in several of the seaports. Correct information upon every point was my first object: for, unless I knew the nature and extent of the evil, I could not seek a remedy. I encouraged, therefore, by the agents, these representations, as the only means by which I could acquire it. Nor was it only as a means: for it has been stated that no interested had been too deeply affected, and long delayed, to be remitted upon the present occasion. In the course of a few weeks, I believe most of the complaints which had been occasioned by the war, and especially where the parties were present, either in person or by attorney, were laid before me. By analyzing them, I found they might be classed under the following heads:

1. Those who were injured by the embargo at Bordeaux.
2. Those who had claims upon the republic for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo.
3. Those who had brought cargoes in for sale, and were detained by delay of payment, or some other cause.
4. Those who had been brought in by the ships of the republic, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce, and were subjected to like detention and delay.
5. Those who had been taken at sea, or elsewhere, and were confined, in derogation of the treaty of amity and commerce, or rights of citizenship in the United States.

Upon investigation of the heads, and in the next following, so far as compensation to the injured parties was in question, I found no difficulty how to act. Your instructions had fully marked the course to be taken. I therefore required that compensation be made as soon as possible, and upon just principles, according to the contract, where such was the case, and the fair estimated value, where it was not. But the two latter in involved in them something more than the mere adjustment of existing claims, and which closed the scene when that was made. They grew out of measures, which, if suffered to continue, might create like injuries every week, and which would require a like interposition on my part. I therefore considered it my duty, not only to require a full indemnity to the claimants, as in the other instances, but to mount to the source of the evil, and seek a remedy commensurate therewith.

I found that the delays above spoken of did not proceed from interest or design on their part; from interest they could: for they not only disgusted, and often injured the claimants, but likewise exposed the Government to considerable loss, upon account of demurrage; and if there was no motive of interest, there could be none for design. They proceeded, in fact, from the system of trade adopted here, by which the whole commerce of the country was taken into the hands of the republic itself. The regulation was such, that neither but the officers of Government could purchase, nor could any contract be concluded and executed in any of the seaports, or elsewhere, than in Paris. This threw every case into the hands of a board of commissaries, in this city, who were otherwise borne down with an immense weight of the most extensive and complicated duties. The defect in our own arrangements too, here, increased the embarrassment: for, as we had no consul here, every captain, or supercargo, became his own negotiator; and as they were generally ignorant of the city, the language, and of the prices last given, they were badly calculated for the purpose. Every new cargo formed a distinct negotiation; and, as there was no system on the part of the venders, who, as was natural, to make the most of their voyage, they usually asked an extravagant price for their merchandise in the first instance. This occasioned a kind of traffic between the parties, and which frequently terminated in the disgust of both, and particularly of the venders, who, after they were wearied out with the Clerks in the Department, and whose it was to receive them, generally assigned the business over to some agent, and who, as he was not clothed with any public character, could neither be much respected by the French Government, nor possessed in any high degree of the confidence of his employers. Such was the state of our trade in this republic, and such the cause of the delay. As young, therefore, as I became sufficiently well acquainted with the subject, I thought it my duty to bring it before the Government, and desire, on its part, a suitable remedy; and if the person lately appointed does not soon arrive, I shall deem it equally necessary to nominate some one as consul, provisionally, to take charge of the business on our part; and if he does arrive, I am by no means certain it will remedy the difficulty, for reasons I shall hereafter explain.

I had more difficulty in determining how to act on the fourth point. I was not instructed to desire a repeal of the duty, and did not know but that it had been tolerated from the soundest motives of political expedience. This republic had declined, during, from a false attachment, a large part of our commerce; and it was impossible to manage the department of affairs contained in the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce, might give birth to sentiments of a different kind, and create a disposition to call on us to execute that of the treaty of alliance. The subject was, therefore, of the utmost delicacy, and I saw that I could not enter on it without the greatest care. But yet I was persuaded that France gained nothing by the departure, and had reason to believe, if it were otherwise, that she would, at the present time, conclude it for our actual mediation; and I knew its importance, and especially as it would deprive the cabinet of St. James of the smallest pretext for continuing the violation on its part. Upon full consideration of all these circumstances, the paper presented was drawn, and I trust, whatever may be its effect, it will have the approbation of the President, since it may produce a beneficial one, and has been prepared, and is now handed him. I have tried to give an answer as soon as circumstances will permit, paying due regard to the immense weight of business before that Department.

Upon the article respecting citizenship, I have as yet said nothing. I did not wish to complicate the subjects which I presented before them, too much at any one time. It is soon attended to, as shall likewise the claim for reimbursement of 50,000 dollars, advanced to the French emigrants from St. Domingo.

Nothing of great importance has lately taken place in the public councils. The remaining spirit of ancient party has been the only phlegm shown in the discussions. It has seemed in a great measure to have been drawn, and to lurk in the bosoms of the more inveterate only. Happily a different spirit, more congenial with the temper of the nation, and which inclines to humanity, to peace, and concord, seems to pervade the great mass of the Convention. I think this latter will soon prevail, so as not only to prevent, at least for the present, further enormities, but to heal, in some degree, the wounds which have already been inflicted. Some latter circumstances authorize this expectation. Barrere, Collot d’Herbois, and Billaud de Varennes, of the committee of public safety, and several of the committee of surete generale, were suspected by many of having connnenced and supported the measures of Robespierre and it was apprehended that, after the perfect and triumphant fall which must end the execution should subside, some disclosures that subject would ensue. Accordingly they were lately denounced by Lecointre de Versailles, who brought forward a long list of charges against them. But it was immediately seen, that the party in favor of the denunciation, though violent, was weak. The convention heard the accusation with patience. Many of this party were now in their turn alike agitated and alarmed, because they thought they saw, in the rejection of the motion, the invincible strength of the other party, and the certainty of their own fate; but they were superficial observers of the course of the revolution, and of the theatre on which they acted. They did not perceive that the force in the hands of that party, was not an unchangeable fixture, but was capable both, and render their extravagant and pernicious efforts abortive and harmless. This latter fact was farther demonstrated by an event which followed immediately after. Under the organization of the committee of public safety, it became necessary to re-establish and propose a new committee, for the purpose of course have been re-chosen. But the contrary was the case, for they were every one rejected, and others preferred in their stead. I have mentioned this incident, because I deem it an important one in the character of the present moment, tending to prove the certainty with which the revolution progresses towards a happy close. Since the preparation of those councils, which are equally distinguished for their wisdom, temperance and humanity continues to increase.

Nor is fortune less propitious to the affairs of this republic in the field than in the cabinet. Within a few days past, Condé and Valenciennes have surrendered to its victorious arms. About 6,000 troops were taken in these engagements, with 1,100 cannon, and which latter were immediately put to the sword. The rigor with which the emigrants have been pursued continues nearly the same, and seems still to be dictated equally by the sentiment of the public councils and the people at large; it will not, therefore, be easily or soon removed. The surrender of these garrisons has relieved from a state of inactivity about 50,000 men, who were immediately admitted to the line at the Meuse and on the frontier of Holland. These armies are at present of great strength, and certainly, upon the ordinary rules of calculation, not to be resisted by the force now embodied against them. In point of numbers, they are by far superior, and they possess the means by which this superiority may be increased at pleasure, and to any amount. Their discipline, too, is superior, and their numbers are equal, or perhaps, whilst on the other side, every thing wears a more gloomy aspect. Their troops are dispirited, and daily wasting away by the events of war, and reinforcements have been for a long time past with difficulty obtained, and seem now to be exhausted, or at least at a stand. And to increase the embarrassment on their part, it is said a dispute has taken place between Coburg and Austria. For the committee, in case they should unite their forces, the latter having set up a claim in consequence of the great force of Prussians, &c. in British pay.

Coburg occupies at present a position near Maaestricht, and York one in the neighbourhood of Bergen-op-zoom. It is thought the French will direct their principal forces in that direction, so as to open a route to deprive Holland of its chief support. These are strong and well provided, but deemed by no means impregnable to the ardor and enterprise of the French troops. It is therefore probable some severe encounters may soon take place in each quarter; for surely nothing but absolute despair will induce the combined Powers to abandon them, and which they must otherwise do, in case the French continue to exert themselves with their usual vigor.

Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.

PARIS, September 3, 1794.

There are some subjects to which I wish to call your attention, and which I deem of equal importance to both republics. They have grown out of the occurrences of the present war, have pressed particularly hard upon the United States, and will, I doubt not, be immediately rectified in a manner becoming the character of the French nation.

The first respects the departure, on the part of France, from the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of commerce subsisting between the two republics.

The second, the embargo of our vessels at Bordeaux, and the injuries arising from it to those whom it concerns. I have been led to offer some of our citizens for supplies furnished to the government of St. Domingo, authenticated by bills upon the minister of the republic in Philadelphia, by bills upon France, and by mandates, and other instruments usual in such case.

As it is a subject of the utmost importance and charity, it is stipulated that free ships shall make free goods, and that all goods shall be free, except those which are termed contraband; and that no dispute might arise as to contraband, all those which should be deemed such on the one hand, and which should be deemed free on the other, are particularly specified in the 94th.

It is proper, in bringing this subject to your view, briefly to observe, that these articles have been dispensed with on your part; that our vessels, laden with merchandise, not only the property of your enemies, made free by these articles, but likewise of our own citizens, the latter of which was always free, have been brought into your ports, where they have been detained for a great length of time, without any proof of their properties, or even of the right of the owners to give them, and to recover them, and the goods. But I will not dwell upon this subject in this view, because I frankly own to you, it is painful for me thus to contemplate it. I wish to reserve my free comments for the other side of the picture, when I shall favorably explain the motives of the act, in communicating to my country what I have seen and heard. And I have not been disappointed in the way of nature, however clear its doctrine, even with respect to contraband; but with France it is in both respects.
regulated by treaty. Besides, we are the allies, and, what is more interesting, the friends of France. These considerations naturally inspire in the councils of the two countries different sentiments in regard to us; and if Britain proves true to those which belong to her situation, shall we, on the other hand, find France reluctant to cherish such as are friendly to us, and consider our rights to sue for our injuries? Will she ally herself with us like injuries? Will our ally contend with that nation in rivalry, which shall harass our commerce most, and do us the greatest detriment? This is surely not a relation for the two republics to bear towards each other. Other sentiments will, I hope, inspire their common councils—sentiments more congenial with the nations of Europe, and also with the citizens of the two countries.

If the French republic gained the smallest benefit from the regulation, there might be some motive for adhering to it. But this cannot, it is presumed, be the case. The most to be derived from it is the occasional seizure of a straggling vessel, destined for the ports of Spain and Portugal; for they are excluded from the ports of England, except through France. It must be, therefore, if the ports of France is the destination of vessels, that would be their destination; add to which, the charges attending the seizure and conducting of vessels from their course must be great, and make it not only an uncertain, but unprofitable mode of supply.

The French vessels, therefore, which, under the protection of our flag, the commerce of Britain may be carried on with advantage to her, and detriment to France. But a moment's reflection will demonstrate that this apprehension cannot, in any degree, be well founded; for the navigation act of England, whose great principles have been wisely adapted here, forbids almost altogether any such commerce. There are no ports in the United States, nor the productions or manufactures of any other country, be carried in our bottoms to Great Britain. This restriction must, in a great degree, inhibit the use of our vessels in any but the direct trade between the two nations: for it is not probable that Great Britain will use the American vessels to export her cargoes to other countries to return, as they generally would be left empty and return, they would generally be left empty and return. On the contrary, we know that her practice in such cases has been, not to countenance the navigation of any other country at the expense of her own, but to protect the latter by convoys. But if this were otherwise, it is to be presumed that the success of the regulation, and the entire success of the French arms, will have decisively settled itself, before that could have produced any material effect.

It must be obvious that the conduct of Great Britain, and especially in regard to the articles of contraband, must depend, in a great measure, upon that of France in this particular: for if France declines to rescind this decree, it is probable she would make it of her advantage to proceed as this will. But if France should comply in the first instance, she will put Great Britain in an embarrassing dilemma: for if she refuses afterwards, it will not only tend to cement our union with France, but combine all America in the condemnation of the conduct of Britain; and if they then comply, to France will the credit be given of having forced her into it.

At the same time I express to you a desire that this decree be rescinded, and the parties heretofore affected by it compensated for the injuries they have received, I consider it likewise my duty to add some observations upon the conduct of France, in a paper of an American vessel in France. In a letter immediately in the hands of the Government. The captain or suprourno cannot sell the cargo to any other person, nor can he get more for it than the public agents will give, nor sail elsewhere without permission. Oftentimes it happens that great delays take place from the necessity of communicating from the seaports with the metropolis, and other inconveniences detrimental to the parties. A regulation of this kind, in its fullest extent, must prove very injurious to both countries, and especially to France. Trade cannot exist under it. It will soon happen that not a single adventurer will seek the French ports; no merchant will enter them but by constraint. The consequence must be, that the commerce of America, so extensive and productive, and especially in those articles in greatest demand here, will be destroyed. Goods will be shipped here by different agents—a resource which, however productive, should not be the sole one, for many reasons; but, more especially, because the produce of the country, having thus become the property of France, will be liable, by the law of nations, to capture in your ports and satisfy the claims of the French government. Neither the British nor American merchant would ever venture to expose his precious cargoes to such a risk. At all events, our country is, by the natural course of things, as great an exporter as importer; and, if secured in the respect which is due to our flag by other nations, and which would enable our citizens in their own legitimate pursuits to supply, in abundance, your markets, (and in which I trust we shall succeed) it would be of no use to you; and, lastly, because the competition of private adventurers would thus be destroyed—a competition which, with all its inconveniences, is a subject of advantage and satisfaction to the French government, to the encouragement of the British market, but, by making known constantly and regularly the prices in America, form a check on their conduct, and furnish the best test of their integrity.

You will observe I do not complain that the public are the sole purchasers, and regard it, at pleasure, what shall be the effect. I have said the agents are paid for their cargoes in some commodity or specie, at their option: or that the agents of the public are appointed in the United States, and as many as may be thought necessary, to purchase our productions on public account and send them here. These are subjects which the legislators of the republic will have to watch over: the decision, respecting the preference of the wish, I wish, at least, that the trade may be opened freely to the enterprising of my countrymen, and which will be the case, provided they be permitted to leave them immediately, if they do not like the market, and despatched without delay in case they do. To accomplish the first point, a general order only will be requisite to the officers of the customs, or other persons in authority in the several ports; and the latter, a regulation of the prices to be immediately given by these officers upon all occasions, when a vessel should arrive, and which might be furnished, as often as any change should be deemed necessary. This would, I am satisfied, banish every cause of complaint; greatly increase the competitions and consumption of the market, and at a much less expense.

Upon the second subject, the Bordeaux embargo, I find the committee has already passed an arret, which secures to the persons interested an indemnity for the delay and other injuries sustained; it only remains, therefore, to adjust the amount of the claims, and pay the parties entitled to it.

This embargo, ordered by our citizens to the Government of St. Domingo, is likewise a matter of account, and which it earnestly hoped will be immediately adjusted and paid. A person authorized will appear in support of the claims, with the evidence, before any board or tribunal shall beapplicable to the same case.

I have to observe that I shall be happy to give every aid in my power to facilitate the adjustment and subsequent payment of these several classes of claims. So far as they are well founded, I doubt not they will be allowed by the French republic; and, where this is not the case, they will not be supported by me. In an aggregate view, they will be very great, and the service rendered to my countrypersons of the expense to the republic, the American Government, and my countrymen in general, will not only bear the de- parture with patience, but with pleasure. It is from the confidence alone, which I entertain, that this departure cannot but be productive of solid benefit to the republic, the American Government, and my countrymen in general, will not only bear the departure with patience, but with pleasure. It is from the confidence alone, which I entertain, that this departure cannot but be productive of solid benefit to the republic, the American Government, and my countrymen in general, will not only bear the departure with patience, but with pleasure.

most beneficial domestic intercourse;—by a generous and liberal policy, France has it at the present moment much in her power to promote this more intimate union; and, in the hope she will avail herself of it, I have thought proper thus to develop the subjects which I have submitted to your consideration.

From the Secretary of the State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

Philadelphia, September 25, 1791.

Sir:—My letter of the 30th July last having been repeated by duplicate, I shall only recommend to your particular and immediate attention the subjects of it.

The spoliations and vexations which are imputable to the French cruisers, and among them, the injuries to our rights, fishing, &c., are of such a character, that together with the excitement of the people in France, the events at Bell the town, have been most exciting, in the individuals interested, a flame, which now and then bursts forth in violent expressions, and which you, therefore, cannot quiet too soon by a proper adjustment. You will find in the enclosed copy of Mr. Fauchet's letter to me, of the 1st August, the strong assurances which he has given on this head.

The new administration, in its declarations, its movements, &c., has placed the care of Mr. Boland, who goes to seek compensation on account of the ship Fame, in a strong case, and will back your remonstrances, however pointed they may be. I do not state the munituus, as his documents speak explicitly, and he himself will be on the spot, ready for further explanation. There is nothing in it you can render your force to accomplish part of our community as on these occasions. Indeed, I flatter myself with the expectation of hearing shortly of considerable advances towards final success on your part.

Mr. James Anderson has been highly recommended, and his letters have shown him to deserve some degree of notice from the President; and it is not suggested to the President that, because it was presumed from some information, which was received, that the places for which consuls were designated at the last session, were not suitable to his views. You will therefore take the earliest opportunity of inquiring into his character and respectability, and inform us. A claim of Mr. Cruger is also forwarded to you, in order that you may pursue the same measures relative to it, as in the others of a similar kind.

Mr. Boland has promised to deliver to you your quota of newspapers. From the beginning of August to this day, they contain the large and interesting items of the transactions of this country, which have been communicated to you, as they arose, if conveyances to France were not, of all others, the most difficult to be obtained. You will recollect the murmurs which have long prevailed there against the excise. At length the house of General Nevile, the inspector, was attacked by a large party of armed men, in the day, and burnt on the ground, together with most, if not all, the out-houses. Foreseeing that Government could not be maintained, and mixing, perhaps, some preposterous views of ambition and personal aggrandizement, the leaders, to render themselves fit, contrived to give an appearance of an universal commotion, and association of sentiment. A large body appeared in arms on Braddock's field, and appointed the 18th of August for the meeting of deputies from all the townships at Parkins's ferry, holding the Virginia counties to send deputies also. The President despatched Senator Ross, Judge Yates, and our Attorney General Bradford, as commissioners; having first required twelve thousand five hundred militia to be held in readiness, in certain proportions, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland and the Carolinas. A combination was formed among the strong, to be held at Redstone at a later day. Our commissioners unanimously prevailed upon those with whom they conferred, to agree to urge the people to peace. But the Redstone opinions were not so propitious as those of Parkins's ferry. The people there assembled were dissatisfied with the conduct of the former committee of conference, and appointed another, which, like the former, were unanimously in favor of an agreement with the Indians. They themselves were to be consulted, and the 11th September fixed for the taking of their votes. The result has been, that every leading man has subscribed to the terms required by the commissioners; that near three thousand men above the age of sixteen have submitted; that there is no real danger of an opposition in the field. However, the militia having been on the march for some time, and it being certain, that although open resistance will not be found, the laws cannot be executed unless some degree of military force be at hand to support the officers, their movements have not been countermanded.

The command is intended for Governor Lee, of Virginia; but the President goes on towards Carlisle on Monday next, after which the commission would return. The President will remain to receive his troops, and to proceed or return. The principal information, which is to be procured from the newspapers, will be the first and second proclamation, the representation of the Secretary of the Treasury to the President, and the proceedings of the commissioners. In a day or two their report will be concluded, which will throw some light upon the whole. The small city of Petersburg, to which Judge M'Kean and General Irvine, two State commissioners, who went upon the same expedition, because their functions were necessarily limited to the mere act of pardon, the great offences being against the United States, not the individual State of Pennsylvania. However, you may be assured that the insurrection will very quickly be subdued, and you cannot err in any political calculation built on this event.

The spirit which the States have manifested is astonishing. Throughout Virginia, to favor the insurgents would be disgrace, and actual personal danger. Some of their emissaries produced a momentary disturbance in Fredericktown, West Virginia, but it was soon quelled by the rapid approach of the militia. In Pennsylvania, from some misunderstanding, the call of the militia was not hastily obeyed. But such an enthusiasm has now grown up and been raging for a considerable time, that the very Quakers have entered the ranks and marched to Pittsburg. New Jersey seems to be a nursery of warriors, determined to support the constitution. Even the democratic societies have raised clout out in a representation of the State, and eight companies of volunteers have volunteered. A company of the Berkshire Militia, under the command of Captain M'Kinstre, is about to embark on the town of New York, with a resolution of stopping the leak. The government is thus every day increasing its measures, and will be greatly increased.

I suspect that Europe will resume with the idle clamors which circulate here, that the yellow fever has again appeared in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York, and that quarantine will be again inflicted on our vessels. But the general and sincere opinion is, that if there be any examples of it within the city, they are too patly to alarm even the old women or children.

The anxiety to hear from you is multiplied tenfold by my knowledge, that all the sentiments of Mr. Fauchet were deposited in the memory of Mr. Le Blanc, and not committed to writing. That which could not be hazarded upon the possibility of detection must be of an important cast. One thing only is certain, that he supposes a British tendency to prevail in some members of our Government, and that the supposition is a copious theme with him. You must therefore take the means of studying this idea. You know how Mr. Jay is restricted: and I must assurance of his knowledge to you, that notwithstanding all the pomsous expectations announced in the gazettes, of compensation to the merchants, the prospect of it is, in my judgment, illusory; and I do not entertain the most distant hope of the successful issue of the proceedings. All is mere paper, and the subject is not yet added. Judge, then, how indispensable it is, that you should keep the French republic in good humor with us.

Spain has, by a conduct similar to that of Great Britain towards us, imposed the necessity of sending an envoy extraordinary thither, also, for the negotiation is at a stand, on the most unaccountable pretexts. My conviction is firm, that both Madrid and Lisbon are equally distrustful in nothing but a hatred against the United States, and a determination to harass them through the Indians.

If, however, a report has come many ways, be true, that General Wayne, on the 20th August, left between one hundred and fifty and three hundred Indians dead on the field near the Rapids of the Miami, their execution might have fallen, and that they would be sick of war.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 16, 1814.

Sir:

I gave you, in my last, a sketch of the embarrassments under which our commerce labored in the ports of the republic, and of my efforts to ameliorate it, as shown by my letter to the committee of public safety, a copy of which was likewise forwarded. To this I have, as yet, received no answer, although I have requested it more than once in my letters. The last time, however, I was informally answered, that the subject was under consideration, and would be decided on as soon as possible.

But as these propositions were of extensive import, and connected with the system of commerce and supply which had been adopted here, it is probable I shall not be favored with an answer until the subject is generally reviewed. I therefore venture to request one of your high offices to publish an answer, and to forward it to me.

But as the opposition will not be warranted by the interest, so far well satisfied it will not be supported by the sense of the French nation, when the subject is well understood. To make it so, will be the object of my future, and I trust not ineffectual, endeavors.

I am not unacquainted I am not surprised to hear that the whole commerce of France, to the absolute exclusion of individuals, was carried on by Government itself. An institution of this kind would be deemed extraordinary, even in a small State; but when applied to the French republic, it must appear infinitely more so. Nor were the circumstances surprising. They were not, indeed, equal to the zeal and energy with which it pursued its object. Through the channel of trade it was found, or suspected, that the principles of the revolution were chiefly impaired; that, through it, not only the property of the emigrants and the wealth of the country were exported, but that foreign money was likewise thrown in, whereby the internal dissensions were kept alive. While the extraordinary time it was believed, that most of the evils, to which France was a prey, proceeded from this source. Many remedies were, in consequence, applied, but still the disease continued. Finally, an effort was made to eradicate the cause, by exterminating private trade altogether, and taking the whole commerce of the country into the hands of Government. A decree, to this effect, accordingly passed on the day of October, 1795, and which has since continued in force.

But these circumstances incline to a change of this system. The act itself was considered as a consummation. It is, therefore, no surprise, that the commercial principles of the nation were erected under the guillotine. By it, the commercial interest, as distinct from the landed, and dividing, in certain respects, with opposite views, the councils of the country, was totally destroyed. All private mercantile intercourse with foreign nations was cut off; and so severe were the measures, and great the odium, on the mercantile character, that persons of attachments to the monarchy, ever since when the last hostile contract of commerce was done away, the motive for the act itself was greatly diminished. Accordingly the public mind was seen vibrating back to its former station; and in which it was greatly aided by the fortune of the late dominant party, whose principles were likewise, in their turn, settled accounts with the republic, as be the receipt of the guillotine. Thus we find, and especially in the French character, that extraordinary expedients, on extraordinary occasions, are the character of their author, but frequently share his fate. The fall of the Brissotin party extinguished private trade; the fall of Robespierre's may probably soon restore it.

But the symptoms are not distant; though none seem willing so prominently to take the lead as to make themselves responsible for the consequences. The only active interest that I can perceive consists, of those who have managed the public trade and been intrusted with the public monies for that purpose. They readily foresee that a change will not only take from them the public cash, but likewise lead to an adjustment of their accounts for past transactions. It is, however, generally the fortune of an opposition of this kind, to precipitate the adoption of the measure it wishes to avert: for as every one suspects that its motive is not sound, and which is proportionally increased by the degree of zeal shown, so every one feels an interest in defeating it. I have endeavored in my propositions to confine them entirely to external objects, by suggesting such remedies as might be adopted without any interference with the interior general system of France. By so doing I hoped that the injuries of which we complain might be sooner redressed, and not made dependent on the great events which happen here.

I soon found that the extraordinary expedient, to which this republic had recourse, of excluding individuals from trade, and conducting it themselves, would, in a great measure, a correspondent regulation on our part.

For, if the conduct of the public servants, on the one side, was not in some measure supervised, and which it could not be, but by public agents, on the other, the impositions which might be practised on our impoverished countrymen would be far from being overlooked. To which it must be added, that the system under which I was placed, whether in that of appointment of supplies for the republic, or the execution of a contract, the bias of the Government and of the people would be in favor of the former. The consulate, under the superintendence of the minister, forms their natural bulwark against the attack.

American citizens alone can furnish an adequate protection to their countrymen. In the hands of a Frenchman, or other foreigner, the consular functions lie dormant. In every litigated case the former shrinks into the citizen, and trembles before the authority of his country; and the latter, especially if the subject of one of the coalesced States, would have no commission only of sufficient force to exempt him from the decree, which would otherwise doom him to a prison. I annex, at the foot of this, a list of consuls and consular agents, with a note of those who have been actually under arrestment and confinement, and by which you will be better enabled to comprehend the justice of these remarks.

My situation was, therefore, in every view, beyond measure an embarrassing one. But as there was no consul or agent, of any kind or any country, here, where the whole business was concentrated, and every transaction closed, it became, on that account, infinitely more so: for I was, in consequence, not only daily surrounded by many of my countrymen, complaining of delays and injuries, and entreatings my intercession for redress, but applied to by them for information and assistance. I was, therefore, forced to settle the affairs of business, and to work as a consul, in whatever aspect, in particular cases, where there were more of the same description. I could not even go through the forms in the offices which were necessary to verify facts, and which, if true, furnished ground for redress. In a word, I was forced to make demands upon any suppositions of the Government, and those demands must be, until verified. I remained thus, for some time, in expectation of the arrival of Mr. Duvernet; although I was apprehensive such an event, in consequence of the general opposition above stated, and the decree, which applied particularly to his case, in stead of affording relief, would plunge me into a new embarrassment. But finding that he received no support from the public body, I procured the resignation of the French consul, and had the honor to nominate my secretary, Mr. Skipwith, provisionally, consul for this city, on the day of —, and notified it to this Government; a copy of which, and of the answer of the commission of foreign affairs, I herewith enclose you.

To Mr. Skipwith I have since assigned the interesting duty of developing and demonstrating the cause of these difficulties, by an appeal to the universal mind to perform the function from that source was invested in agents, and in the several ports, to render him a statement of those within their particular jurisdictions. Thus enlightened, he will make a report upon the whole subject to which, and I will immediately lay before the committee, and will be enabled to act as an agent and with more effect, and with greater propriety.

At present I can say nothing decisively upon the subject of a general arrangement of the consulates. What have said may furnish some hints that may be useful. But I wish, before any thing is definitively done in that respect, to give you the result of my further remarks on it. Mr. Fenwick will be here in a few days, and from whom, I hope, I shall receive much information from that source. The acting consul, whom I have placed in the office in which he has placed. But as he undertook it without the prospect of emolument in the official line (for, in truth, the duties required of him are not strictly consular, but novel, and growing out of the emergence of The time) and more from a regard for the public interest, and to accommodate me, than himself, although I was thereby deprived of his services in the immediate station in which he had accompanied me, yet I could not bereave him of the appointment I had personally conferred, nor divert from him the salary belonging to it. By permitting them to acquire, and give, such information as will enable you to proceed with more propriety afterwards—a consideration which will induce me to bear the inconvenience, to which I shall be personally subjected, with pleasure. If it is possible, Sir, at present, not to increase, but to withdraw the jealousy of this Government was immediately discovered, with respect to those who, being subjects of England, or any other of the coalized Powers, had passed over to America since our Revolution, become citizens of some one of the States, and returned to their proper country, where they now resided. It was suggested to me, by the commissary of the States, that the authority of the house of representatives by a motion, passed, was to proceed at once in the presence of the armies, and in presence of the public councils, a host of spies, who would report the circumstances of the country to their enemies. It was likewise urged that I had no right to do it: for, although this description of persons had acquired, for the time, the right of citizenship with us, yet they were more attached to other countries, since they had become acquainted with the property of this country, and the manners of its people, and the habits of the army without such persons, two of whom were said to be confined at Dunkirk as spies. The subject was, in point of difficulty, and I was really embarrassed how to act in it, so as to satisfy this Government, and do justice to the party whom they supposed to have been betrayed into a dangerous situation by it. And yet the argument was equally strong on the other side: for, if the subject of another Power, it was equally difficult to distinguish between such and any other subject of the same Power, especially in this region, where the right of expatriation is generally denied. But, in point of expedience, there was less difficulty in the case. Considerations of its nature, a privilege. It implies a right to which none of this society. But with the if considerations of this kind are to be regarded, I can see no reason why it should not, in the present instance, be construed strictly: for, if a temporary emigrant, after availing himself of this benefit for a few years, and for the purposes of trade, in our indigent country, chooses to abandon us, and return from whence he came, why should we follow him, on this side the Atlantic, to support, in his behalf, a privilege which can now only be claimed, at best, for private, and perhaps dishonorable purposes? Can any motive be urged of sufficient force to induce us to embark here in this kind of controversy, at the hazard of our national character, and the good will of the nation belonging to the subject of these disputes? Where is that pride of country which, at every crisis, has been the principal source of our strength? I am satisfied it will not, of the kind that merits encouragement: for it will rarely happen that a single member of that respectable list of philosophers, artists, and yeomen, who seek an asylum with us, from the troubled governments on this side the Atlantic, will ever cross it. These observations apply only to those who settled with, and abided by, their former country; but there are others, by whom the British territory, (who were, of course, in the common character of British subjects, equally members of our Revolution) who threw their fortunes into our scale, as being as much Americans as if they were born with us. After some discussion with the commissary on the subject, it terminated by an assurance, on my part, that I should be particular in my cautions as to such characters, and refuse my passport to all of that description (except in cases of hardship, and upon which he should be previously consulted) who were not actually resident within the United States. This arrangement was satisfactory to the Government, as you will perceive by the commissary's letters to me, copies of which are hereewith transmitted. I shall, however, be happy to be instructed by you on that head.

The councils of this republic still continue to present an interesting, but by no means an alarming, spectacle. Instances of animated debate, severe censure, and even vehement denunciation, sometimes take place. But it is not the perturbation and agitation of these matters, that produces the distress of the minds of the people. The mountain party is rapidly on the decline, and, equally so, that, if the opposite one acts with wisdom and moderation, at the present crisis, it will not only complete its overthrow, but destroy the existence (if possible in society) of all party whatever. The agitation which now occasionally shows itself proceeds from the pressure of this latter party on the field of public discussion, and, by various means, to its end, the making war upon their enemy: for having, since the fall of the Brissotines, willed the councils of the nation, and been accustomed to a pretty liberal use of their authority over the remaining members of that party, they bear, with pain, and without apprehension of danger, their present decline. The tone of the discussion, therefore, frequently exhibits to view the external of a violent controversy between two rival parties, nearly equally balanced, and which must terminate, under the preponderance of either, in the extirpation of the other. But this I deem only the external aspect; and upon considerations, in my judgment the most solid, I have observed, generally, that the first radical consequences of the declared principles and practice of the mountain party, is to break through the restraint imposed on them by their leaders, (if, when a force is broken and routed, there can be any leader) and sally forth into extravaganzas, which provoke resentment, where they should only entice pity; and whilst a different conduct is observed by the leaders themselves: for neither Barrere, Billou d’Availles, Pichepin, nor the leaders, have in their turn, taken into consideration, the possibility of the attack, and to which they confine their comments strictly, and with all suitable respect for their opponents. I observe, also, it rarely happens that any very distinguished member in the preponderating party takes share in these discussions; and much more particularly in the cases of hardship, and upon which he should be previously consulted) who were not actually resident within the United States. This arrangement was satisfactory to the Government, as you will perceive by the commissary's letters to me, copies of which are hereewith transmitted. I shall, however, be happy to be instructed by you on that head.

composed only of the enemies to hereditary monarchy, comprising the members of the three succeeding parties, of Brissot, Danton, and Robespierre. During the whole of the first era, therefore, or until the deposition of the King, this society may be considered as the cradle of the Revolution; for, most certainly, the republic would not have been formed; the public sentiment objectionable, the means of discussion and free criticism upon men and measures, contributed greatly to forward that important event.

But from that period, and through the whole of the second era, the society has acted a different part, and merited a different character. The clergy, the nobility, and the royalty went; the whole Government was in the hands of the people, and its whole force exerted to maintain them. There was no doubt, anything existing; there was nothing left, with which merited reparation, or with which the popular sentiment, virtually inclined, could take offence. But it had already gained a weight in the Government, and which it had now neither sufficient virtue nor inclination to abandon. That weight, therefore, it has assumed, and of which we believe it was heretofore so formidable to the despotism, now brandishing the same weapon against the legitimate representation of the people.

Its subsequent story is neither complicated nor various. As the Revolution was complete, so far as depended on the interference of things, it had no service of that kind to render, nor pretext to color its movements. It was reduced to the alternative of either withdrawing from the stage, or taking part in the ordinary internal administration, and which it could not do otherwise than by becoming an instrument in the hands of some one of the parties against their will. This was, therefore, it has assumed, and in which we believe it was heretofore so formidable to the despotism, now brandishing the same weapon against the legitimate representation of the people.

It may be easily fact, and very deserving of attention, that, in the more early and latter stages of this society, the best men of France were seeking an admittance into it, but from very different motives. In the commencement and until the establishment of the republic, it was resorted to by them for the purpose of promoting that great event. But in the latter stage, and until the fall of Robespierre, it was resorted to by them merely as a shelter from danger. Virtue, at that period, was too much in its account, with them, to induce them to take part in such a specious affair as a society, the object of which was, of course the object of his persecution. Nor was any man of independent spirit, possessing them, secure from its wrath. The Jacobin society could alone furnish any kind of protection, and to this circumstance it was owing that the depravity of its members, and the disgrace under which its leaders were held, was not more horrid. It is therefore only justice, that the present preponderating party in France, and the world at large, should now look with indulgence, and indeed with forgiveness, upon the conduct of many of those who seemed at the time to abet its enormities. Unfortunately for them, and for their country, their presence secured only a partial exemption from danger. The preponderating influence had long been in the hands of those of a different description.

In the last scene which was acted by Robespierre, and in which he placed himself at the commune in open rebellion against the Convention, it is said that this society arranged itself under his banner against that assembly. But after his fall, and which was instantaneous, it immediately endeavored to repair the error which it had committed. It was believed that the eye was only upon some who were admitted to be bad members, and others who were said to have forced themselves, at that tumultuous moment, uninvited, into the society, and who were not members at all. It even went into high censure of Robespierre himself. But the principles of the controversy were too deeply rooted in the minds of all to be so suddenly eradicated. It was obvious that a crisis had arrived which must eventually settle the point, whether the Convention or this society should govern France, and equally so, that the public mind was, and perhaps long had been, decisively settled in favor of the former. As the catastrophe was approaching, this society, as heretofore, used at one time, an elevated or commanding tone, and at others a humiliating one. But the Convention acted with equal caution, and effectually strike at the very root of this popular and dangerous tendency. The attempt was thrown by contrasting the wisdom, the justice, and magnanimity of its own present conduct, with the past and recent enormities of this society, is uncertain. The leading members of the preponderating party seemed doubtful upon this subject. But the great mass of the society, which was represented by M. Pinel, the Guarde Convention, through the country, forced the convention into more decisive measures. By its order, the secretary of the society at Paris was arrested, and all the deputies from those associated with it through France, and who had arrived to deliberate upon the state of their affairs, were driven from the city, under a decree which exempted none, not inhabitants of Paris, except our countrymen. Of all France, Marseilles was the only district in which its efforts produced any effect. A small commotion, excited there, was immediately quelled by the ordinary police, and who, after an example of the leaders, reported it to the Convention.

What the commotion in regard to this society, is uncertain; the subject is now under discussion, and I shall, I presume, be able in my next to give you the result.

The same success continues to attend the arms of the republic, and in every quarter. They have taken, since my last, in the North, Juliers, Aix-la-Chapelle, Cologne, and Bois-le-Duc, and in the south, Bellegarde, with immense store of prisoners, without it. &c. In march, and arm of thirty in Juliers and Bois-le-Duc; at both of which latter places a general action was hazarded by the opposite generals, and in which they were routed with great loss. It is said, indeed, that the action which achieved Juliers, was among the most important of the present campaign, since they were the first time the powerful batteries of Artois, the Minster, were employed to advantage in the field. The army, through the country, forced the convention into more decisive measures. By its order, the secretary of the society at Paris was arrested, and all the deputies from those associated with it through France, and who had arrived to deliberate upon the state of their affairs, were driven from the city, under a decree which exempted none, not inhabitants of Paris, except our countrymen. Of all France, Marseilles was the only district in which its efforts produced any effect. A small commotion, excited there, was immediately quelled by the ordinary police, and who, after an example of the leaders, reported it to the Convention.

What effect these events may produce in England it is difficult for me to say. That Austria, Prussia, and Spain, have been for some time past wearied with the war, and have wished to withdraw from it, is certain. That they will withdraw from it soon, is more than probable, and upon the best terms they can get. England, therefore, will have to maintain the contest alone; for Holland will be complacent, and subject to the will of the conquerors. This, however, is not the only danger which impends over her. Denmark and Sweden, offended at the unlawful restraint imposed by her on their trade, in the arbitrary rule of contraband, have, for near three months past, united their forces, and, as the first step of the war, have advanced with great vigor. Indeed, war thus far, ana so hotly conducted, and irritated with that Power, has, I have reason to believe, serious thoughts not only of abandoning the war, but of acceding to this combination. The lapse of a few weeks, however, will, no doubt, unfold these subjects more fully to view.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 7, 1794.

Sir: I have been favored with yours of the 30th of July, original and duplicate, and had the pleasure to receive them unopened.

In my last last letters, which were of the 15th September, and 16th October, I informed you of the several subjects which I had brought into the committee of public safety, as also of the ill success which had attended my efforts to obtain an answer upon any one; and I am sorry to be under the necessity now to add, that although I have presented my last letter to the next council, they have not thought fit to answer any of the points.

Being wearied with the delay, I notified to the committee, soon after the date of my last letter to you, that I should be glad to confer with them, or some few members, on the subjects; provided it comported with their rules in such cases, and would otherwise be agreeable. The proposition was immediately assented to, and the evening of the same day appointed for the interview. I attended in their chamber; we had some discussion, and which ended in a request, on their part, that I would present in writing the sum of what I had said, or wished to say, either on the points depending, or any others I might find necessary to bring before them, and which I readily promised to do.
By this time I had obtained from Mr. Skipwith a comprehensive statement of the embarrassments attending our trade here; as well those which proceeded from the cruisers of the republic, and applied to what was destined or cleared out for foreign countries, as those which proceeded from the commercial system of France and applied to the direct commerce between the two republics. As his report to me specified not only each particular cause of confusion, but the state of the consuls at Paris, in which cases of their own affairs, were long accumulating, and had probably attained a height of which they had no conception.

As I had reason to suspect that the chief opposition proceeded from those who conducted the public trade, and who were attached to that mode from motives not the most patriotic, I thought it proper to examine the question, whether the state of the consulars for the republic to encourage the competition of its markets, or depend on agencies employed in or sent to those countries for that purpose. This subject had been incidentally touched in my first note; but I thought some benefit might be derived from a more thorough development of it. With this view I sent in, at the same time, the paper, entitled "Supplemental Observations on the American Foreign Relations." I felt extremely embarrassed how to touch again their infringement of the treaty of commerce; whether to call on them to execute it, or leave that question on the ground on which I first placed it. You desired me in your last to the priming of that article, and that did not arise from any desire that it would be advisable to demand of them the execution of those articles. Upon full consideration, therefore, I concluded that it was the most safe and sound policy to leave this point where it was before, and in which I was the more confirmed by some circumstances that were afterwards disclosed.

I therefore, after this last communication was received, asked the secretary of the committee, assuring me that the subject engrossed their entire attention, and that an answer should be given me as soon as possible; and a few days after this, I was favored with another, inviting me to a conference at twelve the next day. I attended and found only the three members of the diplomatic branch, who, by directing, had advised and pressed them to execute the 23d and 34th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce: That they were persuaded their compliance would be useful to us, but very detrimental to them: It would likewise be distressing for Frenchmen to see British goods protected by our flag, which, besides, would be a most indelicate mode of making them sacrifice to us, if not to insist upon our executing the treaty? I replied I had nothing new to add to what I had already said on that head. Talleyrand seemed surprised at the reply, and expressed a wish that I would declare myself frankly on the subject. I told him I was surprised at his request, since I had not only declared myself frankly, but liberally. We then passed some time to inquire into the general discussion of the committee, which I urged, that if she considered her own interest only, she ought not to hesitate, since it gave her the command of neutral bottoms, and, under the protection of their own flag, to supply her wants; with other considerations, which had been previously made, and may not have been before the committee. On which occasion: "Do you insist upon or demand it?" I found that a positive and formal declaration on this point was the sole object of the neutral conference; and as I perceived that something was intended to be founded on it, either now or hereafter, if given in the affirmative, I was the more resolved to avoid it, and to adhere to the ground I had already taken. I therefore repeated my declaration, and, in the most explicit terms, that I was not instructed by the President to insist on it, nor did I insist on it; that their compliance would certainly be highly beneficial to my country, but that in my observations I had considered the proposition merely in relation to France, and wished them to do the same, and that I had satisfied myself that the true interest of France dictated the measure. They all expressed an attachment to the proposition, but the difficulty was, a scruple, "whether the state of the public mind, any measure which might be construed as eventually favoring England; and thus the conference ended.

In attaching the subject over since, I have been doubtful whether the solicitude shown, to draw from me a decisive answer to the question "Whether I insisted or demanded of them to execute the articles of the treaty," was merely intended as the basis of their own act, complying with it, and a justification for themselves in so doing, or as a ground to call us hereafter, in the prosecution of the war against England, to fulfill the guarantee. I was, at the moment of the discussion, in the committee, of the latter opinion, but I most explicitly, upon a more general view of all the circumstances that have passed under my observation since my arrival, that I am, at present, inclined to be of the former. I rather think, as there is an opposition to the measure, and it would commence an important change in their system, and might also be construed into a partiality for England, (a nation by no means in favor here) might provoke the discussion, which, to me, appeared to me from the use of the word "insist" that they thought they should have insisted upon it. I found it would be impolitic to demand it: since the refusal would weaken the connexion between the two countries, and the compliance, upon that motive, might, perhaps, not only produce the same effect, but likewise excite a dis- position. Their opinions are at present so divergent, that it went, as it ought, from their officers, to obtain an answer, and a favorable one. If the subject was before the Convention in the light it stands before the committee, I am convinced it would long since have the case. But it is difficult to get it there: for, if I carried it there myself, it would be deemed a kind of denunciation of the committee. Yesterday there was a change of several of the members of that body and which I deem, from my knowledge of those elected, favorable to us. Be assured that I shall continue to press this business with all suitable energy, and in the mode that shall appear to me most eligible; and, in the interim, that I will do everything in my power to prevent abuses under the existing system.

And for the sum of the fifteen thousand dollars advanced for the emigrants from St. Domingo, I have made no formal demand, because I wished the other points, which were depending, settled first, from an apprehension that, if they granted several little matters, it would fortify them in a disposition to reject those that were important. I have, however, repeatedly urged the point, and in no deprecatory, manner, that it should be calculated on by the Department of the Treasury. I shall certainly bring it before them shortly, as I shall immediately the affair of the consul in the Isle of France; upon which latter point, however, permit me respectfully to add, that the appointment of a person not an American, perhaps an Englishman, to the office of consul, has not only been a great cause of the disrespect to our authority, but might impress the business of this commission were exposed there.

With respect to the business with Algiers, I have not known how to act. It will be difficult for France, in the present state of affairs, to support the measures of our resident in Portugal, or for them to concert any plan of cooperation. It seems, however, in every view, proper to ride ourselves of the person in Switzerland, who, I understand, has been in readiness to prosecute the business for some time past. I have, in consequence, written him a letter, in conformity to your idea, of which I inclose you a copy, and which, I presume, he will consider as a requisition to the minister of foreign affairs in that country, to be viewed with the greatest caution, and not be adopted by which she may forward the measure of Colonel Humphreys, I will endeavor to avail him of it. But certainly, if it is expected that her aid will be efficacious, or that she will embark with zeal in the business, the whole should be concerted and executed by the consul here, who have been of such an hour, and whose business hereover may be done. Here is pursuing it without calculating upon any aid from France. A letter which was presented me by Mr. Cathalan, our consul at Marseilles, and which is now here, as are Mr. Fenwick, Dobree, and Coffyn, a son of Mr. Coffyn, consul, and who came here to represent his father,) from Captain O'Brien, was carried to him by a friend. But I must beg you to show your power here under my country any service, in this distressing business, in my power, even by visiting Algiers, if it were necessary.

I have inquired into the character of our consuls at the several ports: I mean those who are Frenchmen: for Mr. Fenwick is well known: viz. La Motte, at Havre; Dobree, at Nanterre; Coffyn, at Dunkirk; and Cathalan, at Mars- selles: and find them likewise in any way understanding, and of excellent reputation, attached to our country, and grateful for the confidence reposed in them. If displaced, it will subject them to some censure: I do not, therefore, wish; though I most earnestly advise that, in future, none but Americans be appointed.

I was extremely concerned, upon my arrival here, to find that our countryman, Mr. Paine, as likewise Madame Lafayette, were in prison; the former of whom had been confined near nine months, and the latter about two. I was immediately united by both to endeavor to obtain their enlargement. I assured them of the interest which I alone felt for them; and, in addition to that by the friends with whom I should embrace every opportunity to serve them; but observed, at the same time, that they must be sensible it would be difficult for me to take any steps officially in behalf of either, and altogether impossible in behalf of Madame Lafayette. This was admitted by her friend, who assured me only wish was that I would have her situation in view, and render her, informally, whatever services I might be able, without compromising the credit of our Government with this. I assured him she might confide in this with certainty, and, further, that, in case any extremity was threatened, that I would go beyond that line, and do every thing in my power, let the consequence be what it might to myself, to save her: with this she was satisfied. She still continues confined, nor do I think probable she will soon be released. I have assured her that I would supply her with money and with whatever she wanted; but, as yet, none has been accepted, though I think she will soon be compelled to avail herself of this resource.

The case was different with Mr. Paine. He was actually a citizen of the United States, and of the United States only: for the Revolution which parted us from Great Britain, broke the alliance which was before due to the crown, of all those who took our side. He was, of course, not a British subject, nor was he strictly a citizen of France; for he came, by invitation, for the temporary purpose of assisting in the formation of their Government only, and was only an American, the Convention itself arresting him, by which he is declared to be a foreigner. Mr. Paine pressed my interference. I told him I had hopes of getting him enlarged without its but, if I did interfere, it could only be by requesting that he be tried, in case there was any charge against him, and liberated, in case there was none. This was admitted. His correspondence with me is lengthy and interesting, and I may probably be able hereafter to send you a copy of the latter. After some time had elapsed, without producing any change in his favor, as he was pressing and in ill health, I finally resolved to address the committee of general surety in his behalf, resting my application on the above principle. I had communicated my intention to the committee, to the president, who assured him he would communicate its contents immediately to the committee of public safety, and give me an answer as soon as possible. The conference took place accordingly between the two committees, and, as I presume, on that night, or the succeeding day: for, on the morning of the day after, which was yesterday, I was presented by the secretary of the committee of general surety, with an order for his enlargement; I forwarded it immediately to the Luxembourg, and had it carried into effect, and have the pleasure now to add that he is not only restored to the enjoyment of his liberty, but in good spirits. I send you a copy of my letter to the committee of general surety, and of their reply.

Since my last, the French have taken Coblenz, and some other post in its neighborhood; they have likewise taken Pampeluna, and broken the whole of the Spanish line through a considerable extent of country. About twenty standards taken from the routed Spaniards were presented to the Convention a few days past.

I likewise send, in the enclosed papers, a decree respecting the Jacquesins, by which all correspondence between the different societies is prohibited, as likewise is the presenting a petition to the Convention in their character as such, with some other restraints I do not at present recollect.

From Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.

Paris, October 18th, 1791.

Upon the several subjects on which I addressed you on the 17th Fructidor, (September 3d) viz: the embargo of Bordeaux; the supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo; and the departure by France from the 23d and 24th articles of the treaty of amity and commerce subsisting between the two republics, I have but little to add at present. The two former points of specification are in the papers, and could not be expected to be in the knowledge of the committee and myself. I had only to ask for such dispatch in the adjustment and payment as the exigence of the parties and the circumstances of the republic would admit of. Nor shall I add any thing upon the third point to change the probable course upon which both the committee will, therefore, be pleased to decide upon each under the considerations which have been already urged.

I likewise stated in that note, generally, the embarrassment under which our commerce labored in the ports of the republic. A general view was all I could then give. But the appointment of a consul for this city has since enabled me to have a more accurate statement of this subject. This subject now becomes of the highest importance, and I have been enabled to examine it with great attention, and reported the result to me, of a copy which I now lay before you. It presents to view a frightful picture of difficulties and losses, equally injurious to both countries, and which, if suffered to continue, will unavoidably interrupt, for the time, the commercial intercourse between them. I trust, therefore, the causes will be immediately removed, and such remedies adopted; and in this I am, more confident, because they which would be deemed adequate will not, in any degree, interfere with the internal police or regulations of the country.

I also suggested in my former note that, however necessary it might be for France to avail herself of agents in America at the present crisis, for the purchase and shipment of supplies thence, here, it should not be relied on as a principal resource. The more attention I have since paid to this subject, the better satisfied I have become of the justice of that remark. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to add some further observations on it, and which I now beg leave to submit to your consideration in the annexed paper.

You will observe the consult has likewise complained of in his report the cases of many seamen and other persons, citizens of the United States, taken at sea or elsewhere, and who are now held as prisoners in confinement. I hope an order will be issued for their immediate enlargement; and, as it is possible many others may be in like situation, that it may be made to comprehend all the citizens of the United States, not charged with any criminal offence against the laws of France, and of which latter description I hope there are none. The committee with, I doubt not, designate such species of evidence necessary to establish the right of citizenship in doubtful cases, as it will be practicable for the parties to furnish.

Pursuant to the earliest an early decision upon these subjects, that I may immediately communicate it to our Government. The Congress will commence its session in a few weeks, and it is the duty of the President to lay before that body, and at that time, the state of public affairs, comprising, as the most interesting particular, the conduct and disposition of other nations towards the United States. Information upon these points will, of course, be expected from me, and I should be mortified not to be able to give such as would be deemed satisfactory.

JAMES MONROE.

Supplemental Observations to the note of the 3d of September, upon the American Commerce.

That France will have occasion, whatever may be the crop for the present year, for supplies of provision from foreign countries for the next, is certain. These must be obtained from the neutral countries; and the credit and influence of the United States of America. It is important for her to ascertain how they shall be obtained, and brought into her ports with greatest certainty and least expense.
There are but two possible ways or modes by which these supplies, or any others, can be brought here, which are: first, by public exertion, or by agents in those countries, whose duty it is to purchase the articles in demand, and send them here on public account: and secondly, by the enterprise of individuals. Both shall be impartially examined.

For as to the certainty; and which will depend upon prompt purchases, safe carriage, and integrity of the agents. As soon as agents arrive in America, it will be known to the commercial interest in every quarter. Whenever they appoint sub-agents, this will likewise be known. When it is intended to make purchases and shipments, this will be known. The movement of vessels to take in cargoes is likewise known. Immediately a combination will be formed at home, and the French will be aware of all the movements of the enemy, of the state of the coast, of the progress of the demand, and when the enemy retires, and the purchase will be made, the whole of the vessels that are to purchase will be under the eye of an entire flotilla. When our troops land, the whole will be on the point of being put into the road of the enemy, and the emplacement will be completed.

But the purchase is finally made and shipped for France; the ships are at sea; the property belongs to France; and the ships, though American, give no protection by the ancient law of nations, which is in force where not otherwise regulated by treaty, and with of course, by England. The cargo of every vessel which shall be taken will be considered the property of the government of France; it will be taken by the captives, and, of course, upon the embarraiments of those who shall take it.

Every agent, when he arrives, will have the account; that the money is not to be delivered but in the manner here specified; and the same will be again repeated, and will be known to all the world. Every artifice of fraud, and every device of doubt, which may be possible, will be known. The agent will be treated as a French officer; he will be quartered at such a place, and under such a system, as will make him like a French officer, and will include every artifice known to the French system. The deception will be known, and be acted upon; it will be known to all the world.

Besides, funds must be raised somewhere, to assure the mode of supply. The amount of its profits will depend upon the exclusion of every other: for every cargo which shall arrive from another source, will take from it so much. It will, therefore, see with jealousy the commencement of enterprises of this kind, and deem each in the degree a robbery of its own resources. It will fear that not only the amount of its profits will be diminished, but that the funds upon which they are to be made, will be exhausted. It will, therefore, discourage these enterprises, by hinting that the republic does not want them; that it has no money to pay for them; that the captnats and supercargoes are ill treated in France by delay, &c. It will be the interest of the agency to crush every other mode of supply, and it will accomplish it, unless the wisest precautions are used to prevent it.

It is the nature of an agency to suspect the honesty of its agents, and to look to the means by which the agency disposed to discharge the trust as faithfully as it could, making, at the same time, the greatest profit for itself, and which would generally be done. But let it be supposed that it was capable of defrauding the public as much as possible, without being detected. It is evident, that in order to prevent this, it must either introduce a dissimulation upon its part, or into the market, and bid one against the other, they would keep the price at its proper level, and thus check its conduct for it charged more than they (allowing for the difference of the commission) it would of course be convicted of fraud; and, if capable of fraud, other and numerous temptations to seduction might be counted. The chief agent will be likely to undertake the business, and the British administration to supply the resource. The witholding it might bring on a crisis in her affairs, and which might terminate in an arrangement that would applaud the agent for his perfidy." Would be not be an object for the British administration to assail? And would it be proper that France and the French revolution should be thus made dependent on agents in foreign countries?

As to the comparative expense, there can be no question upon that point. The commission itself will be a considerable thing, in addition to which the freight will be increased: for if American vessels are employed, the owners will have to pay a share of the expense; and that will be the case if the property was their own not to repeat the increased price which would be demanded by the agents, in consequence of the combination among the merchants to take advantage of circumstances which would be known to them; nor to suggest that, under any probable modification, it would be the interest of the agents to give the highest price possible.

Every thing that has been said, or can be said, against a chief dependence on agencies, forms an argument in favor of encouraging the ordinary private trade by individuals, and shows that the supply by that mode might be made more sure and cheap. If France would regulate things so that the parties bringing provisions into her ports were immediately and despatched, she might command, if necessary, the whole produce of America. Nor would it be necessary that the payment be always in specie. On the contrary, return cargoes would more frequently be made in kind, or in manufactured or prize goods.

The above is a short sketch of the conveniences and inconveniences which attend the two modes of supply. The one which in conjunction with a monopoly will be attended with all the inconveniences which belong to monopolies in general, and the other with all the inconveniences which follow upon the performances of other monopolies of foreign trade are confined to luxuries of little importance, and of countries whose citizens cannot send them to market; whereas, the present one is a monopoly of the necessities of life in great demand here, to be obtained from countries whose citizens can best supply them, and at a crisis of affairs when the failure may hazard every thing valuable to France, and when of course it should be most avoided. Whilst, on the other hand, the latter, which is a system of free trade, will not only be free from these objections, but enjoy some benefits which are peculiar to it. It will leave commerce in the hands of individuals, and under the protection of the flags of both countries. If it was made known that France would protect the neutral commerce, the merchants would have no need to encourage to enterprise, and the neutral Powers would be more decisive in vindicating their own rights. The French flag would be deemed the guardian of trade, and the assessor of the freedom of the seas. The American merchant would beheld it with pleasure, because they would find under its banner not only the friendly welcome of their ally, but likewise the safety from the pincers of the ocean. If the demand in France was great, it would be known in the United States, whose merchants would immediately supply the demand. And if it was interrupted on the sea by the vessels of another Power, what would be the obvious effect of such an interruption? Might not France oppose it, and conduct the vessels safe to her ports? and would it not rouse the nation injured to vindicate its rights, and protect its own commerce?

Unhappily, France has adopted a different policy towards us, herefore. Instead of encouraging individuals to supply her market, she has given them every possible discouragement which could be devised. Instead of protecting her commerce at sea, and leaving us to seek reparations for the injuries which were rendered us by other Powers, she has rendered us like injuries, and thus embarrassed our councils. But it is not too late to change this system of policy. The Americans have lamented it not more on their own account than that of France. It has, as yet, left no unfixed impression behind it; and if the necessary regulations are made, commerce will soon resume its ordinary course.

I do not, by this, object to the plan of supplying by agency altogether. On the contrary, I deem it necessary; because I think it proper for France to avail herself at the present crisis of every resource within her reach. I only wish that it be not relied on as the sole one, and which it will certainly be, if the least measure is adopted at the present time to establish the systematic fecondary private trade, and to restrict agency, and to be guard against any misconduct in the agency abroad.
We have received your letter of the 27th of this month, with the pieces annexed. They merit the most serious attention. We will hasten to examine the complaints which are therein exposed, and we hope that the result of our deliberations will be as satisfactory to your fellow-citizens, as conformable to the principles of fraternity and attachment which have always guided the measures of the Government of the French republic towards its good and faithful allies, the United States of America.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, November 20th, 1814.

SIR: I was favored about five weeks past with a letter from Mr. Gardouqui, Minister of Finance in Spain, enclosing one for Mr. Otto, formerly in America, and at present chief of a bureau in the Department of Foreign Affairs, mentioning the decline of his health, and requesting my co-operation with Mr. Otto, in soliciting of this Government permission to return. This letter was written during his illness, and I knew, was too far advanced for him to derive any benefit from the waters, and I was not apprised that those suggested were better than others within his reach. Besides, Mr. Gardouqui and myself were, in consequence of a collision on the much litigated question of the Mississippi, not on the best terms while in America; certainly not on such as to authorize an application of this kind to me. The disease was, therefore, too thin to hide from me the true object; I immediately inferred that it was the body politic of Spain that was disordered, and not the animal one of Mr. Gardouqui. As I did not wish to become the instrument of Spain in this business, or incur the slightest suspicion of the face upon a new line. It was informed that it was their intention to send a Plenipotentiary to the United States, and that he would be Mr. Otto, or answering, for the time, that of Mr. Gardouqui to me. About three weeks afterwards, I received a second letter, which confirmed me in the opinion first taken up, that the object was to open the door, through me, to the commencement of a negotiation for peace. I found, therefore, that it became my duty to take some step in regard to this matter, and to propose to my government to come in such manner as to make the incident, if possible, productive of some good to the United States, if of none to Spain.

When I reflected that we had interfering claims with Spain, as well in respect to the boundaries as the Mississippi, and with the latter, she would not only expose us to great and unnecessary detriment, but likewise hazard the probability of being drawn into it again, in case it should take an adverse course, in regard to us. Upon full consideration of all these circumstances, I thought it best to lay the letters of Mr. Gardouqui before the committee, with my free comments upon them. I did so, and told them distinctly that, in my opinion, it was the wish of the Spanish court to commence a new line of conduct, and that it had adduced itself through me, to inspire a distrust in me, by creating a belief that the United States were more friendly to Spain and Britain than to France. I explained fully our situation with both those Powers, assuring them that we were threatened with a war from both. Also, I stated the indecency and artifice of Mr. Gardouqui, in applying to me without the knowledge of our Minister at that court, and through an ignorant friend of his, that she would be able to make a respectable opposition to any effort we might make on the other side of the Atlantic. But this step, by which France would remove such pressure, and leave the Spanish Government at liberty to act with its whole force against us. I was likewise persuaded it was the interest of France to have our accommodation in view, and to give her aid in forwarding our arrangement with Spain, at the same time that she adjusted her own: for if she should close a peace with that Power, whereby she left it at liberty to act against us singly, or jointly with England, in case of a war being declared by the States, we should not only have us as those parties that the necessity of closed without a satisfactory adjustment, and that Spain was probable, in concert with England, exciting the Indians against us. From these considerations, inclined to deem this movement of Mr. Gardouqui an insidious one, I was the more so from the further consideration that he had made this application to me without the knowledge of Mr. Short, through whom I had been lent by my friends in France, if it was of our power, if it was under or that she Spain upon the United States. I was, therefore, the more resolved to suffer myself to be restrained by no unnecessary and false motives of delicacy towards Mr. Gardouqui, in the manner in which I should treat the subject.

The Committee of Public Safety to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 30th Vendémiaire (October 21st, 1794.)

3d year of the republic.

We have received your letter of the 27th of this month, with the pieces annexed. They merit the most serious attention. We will hasten to examine the complaints which are therein exposed, and we hope that the result of our deliberations will be as satisfactory to your fellow-citizens, as conformable to the principles of fraternity and attachment which have always guided the measures of the Government of the French republic towards its good and faithful allies, the United States of America.

MERLIN. RICHARD. TREILLARD. DELMAS.
with considerable amount in stores; and, it is said, that commodities are taking place in five of the provinces, who have formally resolved to dismiss the Stadtholder, reform the Government by the republican standard, and ally with France. This must be felt in England, and will probably excite disturbance there. In any event it will produce such an effect in the court of St. James's as strikes the blow to her own interests, and which every other consideration prompts, it must be decisive, and, if not ruinous to the fortunes of that proud and insolent nation, will certainly secure us the objects we have in view.

If the first course of the committee about the proposition for a loan, &c. I will advise you of it by the French minister, who leaves this in about five days. By the paper which I send, you will understand how far the point has been discussed, of the propriety in France to support our claims against Britain and Spain; the opportunity for which was furnished by my friend Mr. Gardoupi, and you will soon be able to ascertain from the minister what his powers on that head are.

Within a few days past, two deputies were appointed by the committee of public safety, by consent of the Convention, to some important trust, but whose names and offices are unknown. It is supposed they are commissioned to treat on peace with some one of the Powers, and which is most probable; but with which of the Powers, or whether this is the object, any man can venture to conjecture.

I apprized you in a late letter, that I had written to Colonel Humphreys, and was endeavoring to concert with him, if possible, the mode by which the aid of this Government, if disposed to grant it, (and which I presume to be the case) may be given him in the negotiation with Algiers. It has been in him. As soon as I do, provided I find it necessary, I will apply for the support contemplated. Previous to this, it will be improper. Touching this subject, I send you a proposal from the Government of Malta, presented by its chargé des affaires here, to be forwarded for your consideration. You will give me, for that Government, such answer as shall be deemed suitable.

Within a few days past, the hall of the Jacobins was shut up, by order of the Convention. That body was constantly at work to undermine and impair the regular and constituted authority of the Government. Moderate measures to check its enormities were found only insufficient and excessive. This last step was, therefore, taken, and there is reason to fear its dispersed members will still continue to provoke, by some rash measure, the intervention of the Convention to such a height, as to bring upon them a degree of severity, it were better to avoid. Within a few days past, also, the commission, to whom was referred the charge against Carrière, formerly representative at Nantes, has reported there was ground for accusation, and to-day, it is believed, the convention will approve the report, and consign him over to the revolutionary tribunal, who will, with equal certainty, and with the general applause of the nation, doom him to the guillotine.

From Mr. Monroe to the Committee of Public Safety.

PARIS, November 12, 1794.

I received, some weeks past, a letter from Mr. Gardoupi, Minister of the Spanish Finances, enclosing one to my care for Mr. Otto, then in the Department of Foreign Affairs, requesting me to present it to him. As I did not wish to be the channel of communication of Mr. Gardoupi to any citizen of France, whatever might be his object, and whether of a private or public nature, I resolved neither to deliver the letter, nor give an answer, for the time, to that which was addressed to me. And I was the more inclined to this from the persuasion that, if of a private nature, the delay could be of no great importance, and, if of a public one, and especially upon an interesting subject, that when it was found I attended only to the concerns of my own country, and did not choose to interfere in those of Spain, that he would take some course more direct for the attainment of the object in view. As some weeks had now elapsed, I took it for granted that this was the case. In this, however, I have been disappointed: for I was favored, within a few days past, with a letter from Mr. Gardoupi, in which he enters more fully into the subject of that communication. Finding, therefore, that he still addressed himself to me, notwithstanding the discouragement already given, I deemed it necessary, not only to examine more attentively the object of this communication, but likewise to adopt, definitively, some plan in regard to it. Nor had I much difficulty in either respect: for, when I recollected that he was a minister of Spain, and observed that his letters, as well as to Mr. Otto, and which I have since examined, as those to me, expressed only a wish to be admitted within the Government of France to attend some baths, I could not but conclude that this was the ostensible motive, whilst other, in reality, existed. And in this I am more confirmed from a recollection of the relation in which Mr. Gardoupi and myself formerly stood, to each other. To which, I add, that the object, of which I have mentioned the communication to the Convention is to be prevented, had not the power which I have the honor to address, could obtain the object, without which the Mississippi, was not the most amicable one. From that consideration, I do not think he would solicit a correspondence with me for a trifling object. What other then must be the motive? In my judgment, there can be none other than the hope of thereby opening the door for the commencement of a negotiation for peace, and that the Spanish court has availed itself of this mode of making that wish known to you.

Presuming, then, that this was in truth the object, it remained for me only to decide what course I should take in regard to Mr. Gardoupi's communications; nor could I hesitate long upon this point, for I well knew it was of importance to you to become acquainted with the disposition of other Powers towards the French republic. I have, therefore, deemed it consistent with that sincere friendship which the United States bear towards you, and the interest they take, as your ally, in whatever concerns your welfare, as well as with that candor I mean to observe in all my transactions, to lay the letters before you; knowing their contents, you will be enabled to determine how to act in regard to them. As it respects the United States, whom I serve, or myself personally, it can be of no importance to me to be acquainted with the result since I doubt not, that, under the wise counsels of the republic, the revolution will progress to a happy close; but permit me to assure you that, if I can be of any service to the French republic, in regard to the answer to be given to this communication, it will give me the highest satisfaction to render it. attack us united, and, in that situation, would not France be forced again to embark in the war, or tamely look on and see our dismemberment? Could the republic, in short, deem its own peace secure or durable whilst these points remained in dispute between the United States and those Powers, and should it not, therefore, seek an adjustment of the whole at the same time?

I have suggested these considerations in the hope that the committee will give the minister, about to depart for America, full power in relation thereto, and in the confidence that a satisfactory assurance on that head would remove the difficulties between the United States and they who have the power of giving them aid in their own resources to support a war against those Powers, it would, of course, be more in their power to lend them to the French republic.

It must be obvious that France may not only secure these points for us, and without any difficulty, but with Spain, which she also pleased: for I am persuaded that the Spanish monarchy would even agree to open the islands to the world, and perhaps even to South America, to end a war which endangers the crown itself.

The mode would be by insinuating to both these Powers, when France commenced her negotiation, that they might expect Spain to follow her example,

The sum which might be raised in America from the different sources above mentioned, upon an assurance of this kind, would, in my judgment, be considerable. In any event, however, I shall be happy to give the minister about to depart every information and aid in my power, in forwarding the object in view.

I confess, however, whether it would not be proper to enable me, in my letters on that subject, to declare what your sense is upon these points.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, December 3d, 1794.

Sir:

I have at length obtained an answer from the committee of public safety, to the several propositions heretofore presented before it, in an arrêt of the 18th ultimo, and which I now transmit to you. By this arrêt the committee have, at the same time, declared the amount due to each of our citizens as were injured by the embargo of Bordeaux, and likewise to such others as have claims for supplies rendered to the Government of St. Domingo. By it, also, many embarrassments which impeded the direct trade between the two countries are removed. The armament of the States, and the precaution of their ves- sels, which were a source of annoyance to some of our seaports and countries, is done away; and the stipulation of the treaty of commerce, which gives free passage under our flag to the subjects of the United States at war with the republic, is likewise enforced. In short, every thing has been conceded that was desired, except the execution of that part of the treaty which gave freedom to goods in ships that were armed.

I have, in consequence, notified to the commission of marine, that I had empowered Mr. Skipwith to take charge of these claims, and attend their adjustment on the part of our citizens, and I shall continue to give every aid in my power, in every mode, to that end. In respect to the liquidation, unless, indeed, some difficulty should arise, as to the mode of payment, whether in assignats or specie, I presume all outlay is at an end. But in regard to the payment, I think it probable, unless assignats are taken, and which are now depreciated, further delay will be desired, owing to the great expenditures of the Government at this very important time, for such a settlement is not capable of giving any satisfaction.

If the treaty could have been carried into effect by general agreement, I should have deemed it a fortunate thing; because it would have secured our commerce hereafter from the possibility of vexation, and upon any pretext whatever, by the French cruisers; and because it would have ranged the French republic, at an important period of its affairs, on the side of a principle founded in benevolence, and necessary to the freedom of the high seas. But as connected with other considerations more immediately applicable to ourselves, and especially, if the hope of forcing it upon other nations, as a law, is abandoned, I have deemed it of but little consequence. It certainly precludes the probability of our being called on hereafter to fulfil any stipulation whatever, and will, of course, gain us greater credit for any services we may render them, in case it should suit us to render them any. I am likewise persuaded, from the responsibility the arrete imposes, and the increasing partiality pervading all towards us, and which is felt by the Americans, and observed by the subjects of other neutral Powers, that the execution of the treaty itself will render it probable that many of our vessels will hereafter be brought in upon the suspicion of having enemy's goods on board.

I informed you some time since, that I was persuaded, if the subject was before the Convention, it would readily be granted; and in this I have not only been confirmed, but, in the further belief, that a majority of the several committees agreed that the measure was justified. The dread, however, of devastation and disorder, as well as the desires of the subjects of the republic, determined them from adopting it. It was opposed, as was likewise every other change, by a party who would not fail to take advantage of it, should a favorable opportunity occur. The sordid spoilers of the public wealth never forgive those who were the only ones who knew how to use their intrigues. And this was the most vulnerable point upon which recrimination could hereafter act: for, as it is contemplated, when the other Powers are withdrawn, to prosecute the war against England, with the collected force of the republic, and this might be construed into a partiality for that nation, it was deemed too hazardous a measure, in respect to the personal safety of the members, to be encountered. In this decision too, it is probable they were more confirmed, by the necessity of cultivating Denmark and Sweden at the present moment, from whence great resources are drawn in support of the war, whose councils are wielded by Bernstorff, a man believed to be well disposed to a reform in the existing Governments of Europe, and whose fleets are combined with no friendly disposition towards England. They would most probably have pressed to be put on the same footing, and the pressure could not easily have been resisted, after the example was given. As a proof, however, of the disposition of the committee upon the subject generally, I herewith transmit to you a copy of a report drawn upon my notes by Merlin de Douay, to whom they were referred, and which was informally given me by his ipsissimis manus.

I apprized you in my last, of the 20th instant, of Mr. Gardoqui's attempt to obtain permission to attend certain baths within the republic, ostensibly upon account of his ill health, but in my judgment to commence a negociation for peace, (a finesse too often practiced) in the same time lessen any weight the United States might have upon that subject, in respect to their own affairs, by inspiring a distrust in me in the outset. I likewise stated to you in what manner I had acted upon that occasion, laying his original letters before the committee, with my free and candid comments upon them; as also the further discussion which took place between the committee and myself upon the subject, and to which an incident of a different kind gave such an aspect. I exposed, as far as the nature of the case would admit of, the real situation of the United States with respect to Spain and Britain, menaced with war by both; showing how France would be affected by that event, and of course, the obstacles that would be taken in their affairs at the present moment. To that communication, I have now nothing new to add, having since heard further from the subject in question, or the one which afterwards occurred. I omitted, however, at that time, to transmit to you a copy of my letter accompanying Mr. Gardoqui's to the committee, and which I now enclose for the purpose of presenting that business more fully.

I am convinced that this exposition of our situation with Britain and Spain, and to which the incident of Mr. Gardoqui furnished the first opening, has been useful: for before that exposition, I had reason to believe, that it was not only unknown, but that a very erroneous opinion was entertained by many, in the committee, upon that subject. I thought I had felt the effect of that opinion, created no doubt in the manner you suggest; but as it was not communicated in a way to enable me to take official notice of it, I was embarrassed how to act, or what measure to adopt in regard to it. For awhile, as it was circulated only in private, I thought it best to counteract it, by making

The necessary explanation only to those who mentioned it to me. Finally, as I knew the campaign was progressing towards a close, and that the winter was the season for negotiation; and more especially, as I feared a combination with either of those Powers, with such improper opinion of our situation with each, because I well knew they would improve with great dexterity to their advantage. I deemed it my duty to make an extraordinary effort to remove these opinions. I applied to the respective Powers, and which took place accordingly. I was resolved, however, not to meet the imputation as a charge supported to exist, or which I was bound to answer, in case it did. A denial of a charge might beget suspicion where there was none. I took different ground, by informing the committee that the war in which they were engaged, like all other wars, must sooner or later come to an end. That much had already been done, that the French, who had not only given the information, that they might retain it in memory for the purpose of availing themselves of it hereafter, in case it should be found expedient. It was received respectfully, but calmly. By one of the members it was said, that the Secretary of War, having learned that they wished peace or not; and if they did, they would, no doubt, be able to find a way whereby to make it known to the republic." By another, I was asked: "Whether Mr. Jay was still in London, and whether he intended to come over to Paris, as had been published in an English paper?" This was the very suspicion I wished to combat above, and if possible, to destroy. The impression was correct; it would have been a service against France: nor has she been able not to feel that he had returned or not, but that she was impossible, the paragraph in the English paper should be, true, as he was sent to England upon an special business only—to demand reparation for injuries, and to which his authority was strictly limited. I then repeated what I had before said of the friendly disposition of the United States towards the French republic; in all cases, and of the pleasure with which they would, in my judgment, serve it upon the present one, if it be the case. That I was persuaded they would listen to no proposition upon the subject of mediation from any other Power; for as it was a business which could not possibly benefit them, they would, of course, refuse to countenance it. I also acknowledged, if any Power upon the subject of peace, but presumed the success of their armies had disposed them all well towards it; and thus I left them to reflect at leisure upon what I had said, in the belief, however, that the communication must produce a good effect. As this took place prior to the affair of Mr. Garibaldi, and which was more particularly, I had thought it to have been so, and to communicate to you may be possessed of every, the minutest circumstance relative to our affairs upon this very important theatre.

If the subject of a loan is mentioned again here, or in America, that of securing for us the points in question must likewise be mentioned. I am, however, anxious to revive it here. I am, however, persuaded it will be revived with you: for so vast are their armies, and extensive their operations, that they must be distressed for money, and forced to gain it from whence they can. And I sincerely wish we may assist them, if possible, and which I presume it will be, especially if not comprised in the war, and which I think cannot be, although we should immediately withdraw from Britain and Spain the rights we have usurped from us. The credit of the United States is such in Europe and America, and their means of reimbursement so unquestionable, especially in the particular of the Western territory (an object viewed at present with great eagerness on this side of the Atlantic) that I am persuaded the amount expected might be obtained by loan; and I am convinced, the people would not in/navy, but bear it with much advantage, if they may be possessed of every, the minutest circumstance relative to our affairs upon this very important theatre.

The above remarks upon the subject of a loan were handed in, I was favored with yours of the 25th of September, and which I beg leave now to acknowledge. Finding that my idea of our situation with Britain and Spain was correct, I was extremely happy that I had given that representation of it. The motive for strong union here, on our part, is the greater, and nothing tends so effectually to promote that object as the belief that we are not deserted by England. In consequence of the information I communicated on the last occasion, and told them I had received a dispatch from you since our last conference, and that our dilemma with those two Powers was ever more critical than I had before intimated. Facts of this kind go further in removing doubts, than any assurances I could otherwise give them. These discussions have enabled me to examine attentively whether it was their real wish that we should embark with them in the war, and I can assure you, in whatever it may be, I was of opinion, that at present, I am persuaded they would rather we would not; from an idea it might diminish their supplies from America. But such is their disposition towards us, that I am inclined to think, if the point depended on choice, their armies to act in concert according as we do embark in the war, that they will see us through it; and have some hope if we do not, and especially if we aid them in the article of money, that they will support, as far as they will be able, our demands upon Spain and England. I am, I must say, of opinion that I could not have avoided the necessity of it, because there is no other feasible alternative. I have had the honor to inform you that the British and Spanish ministers have been seen here, and have intimated that they will be preterred. Britain is certainly not in a condition to embark in a war against us, though we should possess her of Canada: she would of course less be apt to do it, if we only placed her troops beyond the lakes. Holland land force was felt in the present war against France: nor has she been more anxious in regard than on account of her fleet and mercenary regulators, by which she subsidised Prussia and other Powers. But that force, small as it was, is greatly diminished, and the combination in which she has been associated appears, not to be completely soiled, but in a great measure broken. The prospect now before her is, that Prussia, Austria, and all the other Powers, will extricate themselves from the war, upon the best terms they can, and leave her singly to support it against France; and that the latter will be aided by Spain unless a particular combination against us should prevent it; and likewise by Denmark and Sweden, if not directly, yet in a manner to produce a servile and insensible dependence of her fleet, and the want and limitations made use of it, have excited the disgust of all nations who would be pleased with it. Both that, and the situation of the Baltic, are important facts. She likewise knows, or confidently believes, that it is the intention of France to prosecute the war against her, for the purpose of breaking her maritime strength, and ridding the ocean from such a tyrant. At home, too, she cannot be free from suspicion, that (the total failure of her operations in India, well known to you) has excited some uneasiness in the public mind, and proportionally lessened the weight of the court. This was lately shown in a prosecution against a Mr. Hardy, and in which a verdict was given for a defendant. And should the French take Holland (which nothing but an imputation already commenced can prevent, if ever the war will be of any length), this circumstance, what have we to fear from her? For her merchants and politicians boast as they will of their resources, yet it is well known, if the American demand was cut off, upon which she firmly relied, they would greatly be hurt. I am persuaded, she would render her engagements and carry on her operations, but by commerce; and lessened as this already is by the war, how could she sustain such a stroke at the present crisis? From her friendship we have nothing to hope. The order of the 6th November was war, in fact, and that has since been modified according to circumstances. I am persuaded, British ministry will come to the same conclusion, if not, she, in her decline, bring upon herself another enemy, who can wound her so vitally? For let her merchants and politicians boast as they will of their resources, yet it is well known, if the American demand was cut off, upon which she firmly relied, they would greatly be hurt. I am persuaded, she would render her engagements and carry on her operations, but by commerce; and lessened as this already is by the war, how could she sustain such a stroke at the present crisis? From her friendship we have nothing to hope. The order of the 6th November was war, in fact, and that has since been modified according to circumstances. I am assured she is inflamed with no other sentiments on this subject, and that they that have taken possession of what we are entitled to, she will readily join with us in repressing the conduct of her own officers for having transgressed their orders. With respect to Spain, I have nothing new to add, since my last, excepting to observe the active assertions that have been made of late to this effect, and that they are repeatedly protracted on the first, and maintained only a straggling battle on the second, but ought to be called but one. Certain it is, that in the two days' conflict, several thousands were slain, and upwards of two thousand taken prisoners, with their camp on each day, and on one, tents for fifty thousand men.
I promised you, some time since, my comments upon the subject of a consular arrangement for the ports of this republic. The consuls have been here to confer with me upon the subject of trade, and I have obtained from them their ideas on that of the arrangement which I now enclose you. I will add my own comments on it in my next, and will subjoin the names of some Americans now here, that may be deemed worthy your attention. I think proper, however, now to mention, that Mr. Skipwith will accept the office of consul for this city, and that I think him worthy of it. He is, in my opinion, a sensible man, of strict integrity, and well acquainted with the duties of the office.

The duties of consul here will be those of consul general, and, in strictness, the commission should be correspondent. They may, however, be performed under that of consul only; for I presume those in the ports will respect him equally in either character.

From the Commission of Foreign Relations to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 3d Firmaire, 3d year of the republic, (November 25th, 1794.)

You will find within, citizen minister, the copy of an arrêté, taken on the 95th Brumaire last, (30th November) by the committee of public safety, relative to the conduct which shall hereafter be observed in the ports, and by the vessels of the republic, towards neutral vessels and their cargoes. This arrêté furnishes an answer to the memoir which you presented on the 17th of Fructidor (September 3d.) You will doubtless be fully satisfied with the dispositions which are there announced. You will consider them as a new proof of the desire of our Government to maintain and strengthen the good intelligence which now so happily reigns between our two republics.

Miot.

Extract of the Register of Arrets of the Committees of Public Safety, Finance, and Supplies, 25th Brumaire, (November 18, 1794) 3d year of the republic.

The Committees of Public Safety, Commerce, and Supplies, order as follows:

ARTICLE I. The vessels of the United States of America, and those of other neutral Powers, shall be permitted to enter freely into the ports of the republic, and retire from them when they please; nor shall it be permitted to any of the captains or owners of neutral vessels, to retain their cargoes against their will.

ART. II. When the captains or owners of neutral vessels are disposed to sell their cargoes to the public, they shall be paid for them according to the bargain which they make.

ART. III. It is enjoined to all the commandants of naval armaments, fleets, divisions, and squadrons, of the republic, to respect, and cause to be respected, upon their responsibility, in favor of the neutral and allied Powers, the rights of nations and the stipulations of treaties, conforming themselves strictly to the terms of the decree of the Convention of the 27th of July, 1793.

ART. IV. In consequence, they are expressly prohibited from turning these vessels from their course; taking from the board of them their captains, sailors, or passengers, other than soldiers or sailors actually in the service of an enemy Power, or of seizing the effects or merchandise which shall be found in them.

ART. V. Are excepted from the prohibition contained in the preceding article—

1. Merchandises belonging to the enemies of the republic, until such enemy Powers shall have declared that the merchandises of the French and American Republics shall be admitted.
2. Such merchandises of the neutral Powers also as are deemed contraband of war; and under which are comprised all arms, instruments, and munitions of war, and every kind of merchandise and other effects destined for an enemy Power’s port, actually seized or blockaded.

[ART. VI, VII, VIII. and IX. regulate the manner of proceeding where neutral vessels are brought in, upon a presumption of having enemy’s goods on board.]

ART. X. The commission of marine shall present, without delay, a statement of the individuals, born subjects of the Powers with whom the republic is at war, who were taken before the present day, upon neutral vessels; that particular arrêtés may be taken in each case for board neutral vessels.

ART. XI. The indemnities which are due to the captains of neutral Powers who were detained by an embargo at Bordeaux, shall be liquidated without delay by the commission of marine and colonies, conformable to an arrêté of the committee of public safety of the 17th of Germinal; and this commission shall render an account, in the course of ten days, of the actual state of these demands.

ART. XII. The commission of marine is specially charged to receive and adjust the accounts which shall be presented to it by an agent of the United States, for such supplies as the Americans have furnished to the administration of St. Domingo; and it shall take the necessary measures to procure to the parties interested the most prompt justice, and shall also present to the committees of public safety, of finance, commerce, and supplies, the results of its operations in these respects.

ART. XIII. The commission of foreign relations is instructed to deliver a copy of this arrêté to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, in answer to his memorial of the 9th of Fructidor (September 3d) last.

CAMBACÈRES, &c.

The Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

Philadelphia, December 2, 1794.

Sir,

On the 27th instant, I had the honor of receiving the duplicate of your letter, No. 2, of the 15th of September last, being the first and only official notification of your having entered upon the duties of your mission.

Alexander Duvernet, who was appointed vice consul of Paris, during the last session of the Senate, lattiered here so long, without a suspicion being entertained of his default, that the President has superseded him by commissioning

Washington at residence in Philadephia.

With the frankness of my friendship, I must discharge the obligation of my office, by communicating to you the opinions which we entertain here concerning the speech which you made on your introduction into the National Convention.

When you left us, we all supposed that your reception, as the minister of the United States, would take place in the private chamber of some committee. Your letter of credence contained the degree of profession which the Government was desirous of making; and though the language of it would not have been cooled, even if its subsequent publicity had been foreseen; it still was natural to expect that the remarks with which you might accompany its delivery would be merely oral, and therefore not exposed to the rancorous criticism of nations at war with France.

It seems that, upon your arrival, the downfall of Robespierre, and the suspension of the usual routine of business, combined, perhaps, with an anxiety to demonstrate an affection for the United States, had shut up for a time the diplomatic cabinet, and rendered the hall of the National Convention the theatre of diplomatic civilities. We should have supposed that an introduction there would have brought to mind these ideas: "The United States are neutral—the allied Powers jealous—with England we are now in treaty—by England we have been impeached for breaches of faith in favor of France—our citizens are notoriously Gallican in their hearts—it will be wise to hazard as little as possible on a point so important as a commercial treaty, and therefore, in the disclosure of my feelings, something is due to the possibility of fostering new suspicions." Under the influence of these sentiments we should have hoped that your address to the National Convention would have been framed as to leave heart-burning no where. If private affectopinions and arguments had been the only points to be consulted, it would have been immaterial where or how they were delivered. But the range of a public minister's mind will go to all the relations of our country with the whole world.
We do not perceive that your instructions have imposed upon you the extreme glow of some parts of your address; and my letter in behalf of the House of Representatives, which has been considered by some gentlemen as too strong, would otherwise be viewed in any other light than as executing the task assigned you by authority.
After these remarks, which are never to be interpreted in any derogation of the French cause, I must observe to you, that they are made principally to recommend caution, lest we should be obliged, at some time or other, to explain away, or disavow, an excess of fervor, so as to reduce it down to the cool system of neutrality. You have it still in charge to reconcile the French to the Frenchman with zeal, but without any unnecessary eclat; because the dictate of sincerity do not demand that we should render notorious all our feelings in favor of that nation.
In your letter you say that you have not been instructed to desire a repeal of the decree which violated the 33d and 24th articles of the treaty of commerce; that you did not know but it had been tolerated from the soundest motives of political expediency, lest the French had reason to perceive the injustice of it. Your position, however, may have been gone further; having declared in your memorial, that you were under no instructions to complain of, or request the repeal of, the decree authorizing a departure from those articles; and that, upon reconsideration, after the experiment made, the committee of public safety should be of opinion that it produces an solid benefit to the French republic, the American Government, and your countrymen in general, would not only bear the departure with patience, but with pleasure.
The fourth head of injury, stated in your letter, shows that you were possessed of cases which turned entirely upon the impropriety of the decree; and such, too, was certainly the fact. Now, without the abrogation of the decree, so far as it respected those cases, the redress which you were instructed to demand, could not be obtained; in truth, there was no cause or pretense for asking relief, but upon the ground of that decree having violated the treaty.
Does not this view lead to the inevitable conclusion, that the decree, if operative in future instances, would be no less unjust in the eyes of the people of America, than it was at the moment: a precedent of gross injustice, which could be accomplished only by a total repeal. The papers of the ship Laurus contained a reference to one or more representations of Mr. Morris against the decree; so that the business had been actually broken to the French Government.
Neither these representations, nor yet your application, appears to have suggested a requisition of the guarantee.
The omission to demand its fulfillment up to this day, is a proof that their policy did not approve of such measure:
and if in this they were wise, since we should have been less advantageous to them by associating in the war, than we have been in our neutral character. If I am not mistaken, this sentiment has been delivered often by Mr. Fauchet.
Besides, you might have very readily repelled any serious allusion to the guarantee, by saying, as your instructions indicate, that you were directed to send that subject on this side of the water. I must add another observation; that I do not see how, if you are to be deterred by the guarantee, you can ever claim compensation for an infraction of the treaty, since you will always be in danger of having it brought up to you.
But, my good sir, let these things be as they will, was it necessary to intimate that an indiffERENCE prevailed in our Government as to these articles, by a declaration that you were not instructed to complain of the decree? I confess that I could not find the data upon which such an opinion could be founded; and undoubtedly the President himself would not undertake, that the People of the United States would bear with patience a departure from stipulations which are generally believed to be important to us. But if, from our friendship to the French public, we might sustain a mischfit with pleasure, still, we should not choose that the assumption of one of our rights, without consulting us, should become the pretext for the assumption of any other.
Let me, therefore, entreat you, if my letter of July 30th has not already stimulated you to remonstrate against the decree, to do so without delay. We do not wish you to swerve from the line of conciliation which is marked out in the last paragraph of your letter. On the contrary, conciliation, which does not detract from the dignity of his Government, its rights, and his own self-respect, is a valuable quality in a minister. We only hope that the committee of public safety may not continue in the belief that the Executive are of opinion that it will be satisfactory to dispense with the articles.
I am extremely surprised at assuring you that many of Mr. Fauchet's discontentments have been removed. The documents concerning the failure to salute the Semillante, and the supposed insult to the Favorite, are enclosed to you, that you may be able to evince our solicitude to cement our good will on every occasion which is offered.
Colonel Alexander Anderson, of this city, who has a claim for compensation, and whose agent will call upon you requests me to forward the enclosed papers. I also transmit some imperfect preparatory information in the case of Mr. A. Gracie.
A fresh collection of spoliation papers is sent, according to the list subjoined. The newspapers, &c. accompany this letter.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, December 5th, 1794.

Sir:

Since my letter of the 30th ultimo, which will be conveyed by the same vessel with this, I have had the honor of receiving your very interesting letters of August 15th and 20th. They are the more acceptable, as affording an earnest of your attention to the kind of intelligence which is, to us, very important.
We are fully sensible of the importance of the friendship of the French republic. Cultivate it with zeal, propounded to the value you have given it, and you will always have a companion in an upright course of public conduct. You are not now alone, but you are associated with Great Britain, or in any manner weakening our old attachment to France. The caution suggested in my letter of the 30th ultimo arises solely from an honorable wish to sustain our character of neutrality, in a style which may be a pattern for the morality of nations. The republic, while they approve of the purity of your conduct, cannot but be persuaded of the purity of our affection.
The President approves your conduct as to the national house offered for your residence. Your interpretation of the constitution is correct. But you are charged to make known his sense of this evidence of respect.

The affair of the consil is noticed in my letter of the 30th ultimo.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH,
Secretary of State.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, January 13th, 1795.

Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that, upon the report of the united committees of public safety, legislation, commerce, and finances, a decree has passed the Convention, since my last, whereby it is resolved to carry into strict execution the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and this republic. I beg leave to congratulate you upon this event, and particularly the unanimity which has passed the Convention, since it demonstrates that the resolution gone so far, towards us. I was always satisfied, as hereofore intimatet, that if I could have brought the subject, in the first instance, before the Convention, I should have succeeded immediately in the latter day, but as the committee was the department organized for such cases, one from the First Committee of foreign affairs, and which is now decided, and which was resolved as it might tend to increase their own dissensions, and embark me upon the fortune of those dissensions. Happily, by pursuing the object patiently with the committee, removing doubts, and avowing objections, aided by occasional changes of the members, this has not only avoided, but I have additional pleasure to assure you that it was finally accomplished, without the least difficulty, and without exciting the animosity of any one.

After my late communications to the committee of public safety, in which were exposed freely the object of Mr. Jay's mission to England, and the real situation of the United States with Britain and Spain, I had reason to believe that all apprehensions on these points, was done away, and that the treaty of amity and commerce, as it might be said, was taken pace towards us. I considered the report above recited, and upon which the decree was founded, as the unequivocal proof of that change of sentiment, and flattered myself that, in every respect, we had now the best prospect of the most perfect and permanent harmony between the two republics. I am very sorry, however, to add, that a letter from Mr. Jay, written but a short time ago, in which he expressed a doubt as to the effect of the points in controversy, but concluded a treaty of commerce with that Government. Some of those accounts state, that he had also concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive. As I knew the benevolent effect which these reports would produce, I deemed it my duty, by repeating them, that I had said before of his powers, or that any thing has been done which will give just cause of complaint to this republic. I lament, however, that he has not thought himself at liberty to give me correct information on that subject: for until it is known that their interest has not been wounded, the report cannot be accounted for. There is a deferring the object of their, which weakensthe bonds of friendship. I trust, therefore, you will deem it expedient to advise me on this head, as soon as possible.

I apprized you, in my two last letters, of an informal communication between the diplomatic members of the committee and myself, upon an interrogatory of theirs, whether it would be possible for France to obtain aid from, or within the United States, for the purchase of arms, and of my effort upon that occasion to interest this Government in support of our claims with Britain and Spain, and to which I was stimulated by intelligence that Mr. Jay's negotiation had failed, and that we were on the point of war, or actually engaged in it, with Britain, as likewise by the knowledge that Spain was covertly seeking a separate peace. I was satisfied that, if France would embark in our cause, in the interest of the crown, that Mr. Jay had succeeded his powers, or that any thing has been done which will give just cause of complaint to this republic. I lament, however, that he has not thought himself at liberty to give me correct information on that subject: for until it is known that their interest has not been wounded, the report cannot be accounted for. There is a deferring the object of their, which weakensthe bonds of friendship. I trust, therefore, you will deem it expedient to advise me on this head, as soon as possible.

I cannot admit, for a moment, the supposition of such a treaty. The committee, through a power which is not in the authority of the Senate, have taken a course, and which was approved by the entire Senate, that I would consider as a violation of friendly relations.

On the contrary, that regard should be shown in all cases to our actual situation; and, with respect to the point in question, that the minister about to depart should be instructed not even to mention it, if you forbade it. So that this business stands upon a footing, as indeed it ought to, whereby, un-
Nor has this wise and humane system been limited to this object alone. It has already been extended to many branches of the subject, and promises to embrace the whole. A deeree was not long since passed, by which a Senate of seventy-one members, formerly of the Brissotin or Girondine party, and who had been confined on that account, were set at liberty, and called into the Convention. A few days after, our countryman, Mr. Paine, was likewise restored to his seat in that illustrious body, in the marks of esteem, and under the approbation of the people. The efforts of so many noble and skilful men, for the advancement of the public interest, have been fructuous; and means of continuance, appear yet even to be but little understood. Freed from this embarrassment, the republic will acquire new vigor in all its enterprises; it will certainly have under its command, for other purposes, a considerable force, which was heretofore employed there.

But in retracing the ground, to repair in detail the injuries which the reign of terror had inflicted, it was impossible to behold the havoc it had made, without feeling some indignation for the authors of such great and complicated misery. This propensity, however, and which was equally incited by the obligations of justice and humanity, was strongly opposed, from the period of Robespierre's death to the present time, by a sentiment of extensive impression, that it was better to prevent the further effusion of blood, and to cover with a veil the atrocities which had passed, so far as they could be covered, than to punish even those of greatest enormity. For some time this sentiment prevailed, and though often irritated and disturbed by the remaining leaders of the opposite party, who courted danger and indecision, yet it appeared probable it would finally prevail; fully expects is accomplished within that limit. The trial, however, of the Nautilus, a long train of respectable citizens at Nantes, who were arrested under the administration of Carriere, in its mission thereby, and brought lately before the tribunal of Paris, opened the scene again, and revived the sensation of horror, which had before in some measure subsided. Such encounters as those in the country, and such as the trial of the Nautilus, were made, for example, by submitting, Carriere, and his accomplices, to the tribunal, in their turn. Condemnation was the sure consequence of their trials and it was expected, so far as the case against him, that all those formerly of that party would now separate from and yield him to the populace as such a line of conduct some might have been arraigned, and the population might have been driven by whose punishment too, the public resentment might possibly have been satisfied. But Billard de Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and even Barrere, a man heretofore noted for skilful movements in critical conjunctures, acted otherwise. They obviously, and from the beginning, made Carriere's cause their own; not only by assisting him in the defense of his liberty, which was possible, but by exciting the Jacobins to take part in his favor; thereby attaching themselves to the declining fortunes of that club, and likewise making some unreasonable motions which bore on their face the complexion of the other party. The separation required at best a dexterous management; but by these means they presented themselves out as an object, invited the public attention, and, in the degree, the public resentment. Mr. de Lecomte, who had shown himself sufficiently prone, upon a former occasion, to commence the attack, took advantage of one of these moments of indiscretion to renew it, and with better effect. His motion was sent to the commission of twenty-one, but he was not able to procure support whether the proposal was wise. The final decision was obtained over the Spaniards, since my last, and in which the two commanding generals, many men, were slain, and nine thousand taken prisoners. And in the North, since the ice, nearer approaches are made to Holland, which will most probably soon be taken. Within a few days past, deputies arrived from the Swiss confederation, to negotiate a peace; but the pretended French vessel, which has been sent to pose it, and who pressed the committee to order toward the English immediately, to assail and enter; Amsterdam; and to which effect orders were accordingly issued. I am satisfied that peace will not be granted to the Netherlands, although a revolution should take place there, on any other condition than that of their uniting in the war against England. It is conceived that a peace to that power, on other terms, would be more favorable to England than its continuance in the war: for thereby the British troops might be withdrawn, and great advantage gained in other respects from its neutrality. This, it is thought, is the object of England in ascertaining to their peace; but, in rejecting the propositions of the French, which were sent to ascertain views that are, however, a confirmation of the war. No argument is so strong as that of necessity, and if France will not make peace it will be impossible for England to do it. In my judgment, it is the determination of this republic to pursue the war until the maritime strength of England is broken; and when the actual state of things is regarded, with that of the comparative power of the American republics, or any other enterprises, of those powers, it is evident that the end which accomplishes the object, and the rapidity with which ships are built, and fleets equipped, here, is inconceivable. Within a few weeks past the Brest fleet has been out twice, (indeed it is now out) consisting of thirty-six ships of the line, fifteen frigates, fourteen sloops of war and cutters, giving the defiance to its antagonist, which continues close locked to the land. More lately, however, some indications were seen on that coast, of a disposition to take the sea, and hazard the fate of the island on a battle, so that it is probable something decisive may take place soon.

With respect to the other Powers, nothing definitive has yet been done in regard to peace. It is certain that several wish it, and particularly Spain and Prussia; but yet some difficulties have occurred in regulating the commencement and manner of the negotiation. England opposes it, because she knows she will not be included; and they, on that account, wish it to be private, merely to avoid the imputations that would arise if it were known; and this cannot well be accommodated under the present organization of the French Government. It is said that a maritime convention is to be concluded, in Switzerland, with power to treat; and that they all have agents there for the same purpose is likewise probable.

I will endeavor, if possible, to forward by this opportunity a report rendered to me by Mr. Skipwith, upon the subject of American claims. Be assured that every possible attention has been, and shall be, paid to this subject. You will see that the present object is the communication of public safety, of the same value of the Convention for carrying into effect the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France; the polite terms, however, in which it is expressed, merit attention.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

ney's cipher, for future use. By his return I hope to be able to remove all uneasiness upon that head, and in which I am the more confident, from a knowledge that the Government here is well disposed to view it with the utmost liberality.

I was also lately informed, by a letter from Mr. Feuvick, that he understood from Mr. Muscoe Livingston, who had lately arrived from Lisbon, that Colonel Humphreys had sailed thence for Algiers, upon the business, as was presumed, instructed to that end; that he, prior to his departure, he had committed to his a message from the agents there, that Mr. Warmington was an English subject, and that circumstances, deprived of his senses, just as he was about to set out from Bordeaux for Paris; whereby he was not only rendered unable to proceed on his journey, but even to communicate to the purport of his message for me. Thus I am led to infer, that Humphreys? Whether it was to draw up a treaty of amity and commerce, to treat for the recovery of property, or to treat with the Government, for the purpose of discharging the prisoners, or for the purpose of procuring the release of his master, has not proceeded to Bordeaux; for, had that been the case, his master would doubtless have yielded us in that negotiation. Under present circumstances, therefore, you will readily perceive that it has become altogether impossible.

The French troops have at length entered Amsterdam; whereby the whole of the province of Holland was brought into union under the power of this republic, as, indeed, the whole of the Seven United Provinces must probably soon be. This was announced, a few days past, to the Convention, by a letter from the deputies in that quarter; two of whom, it is said, are on their way to render an account in detail of this very important acquisition. It is reported that they have surrendered: indeed the general idea is, that no other proposition will be made there to the French armies, and, of course, that this republic will become possessed of the fleet and immense stores of every kind. The Prince of Orange, with his family, accompanied by several members of the States General, had made their escape; but by what route, and whether for London or Berlin, is unknown.

After the entry of the French into Amsterdam was certain, and, in consequence, the entire conquest of the Seven Provinces more than probable, an effort was made by the States General to yield the same thing, upon terms, for the purpose of putting the republic in possession of the country by treaty instead of conquest; and with this view an agent, who arrived here about the middle of last month, was despatched; and who, indeed, as I am well assured, was appointed for the special purpose, by the Senate of Amsterdam, to conclude the most advantageous terms of the war, quarters and provisions for such force as should be deemed adequate to hold them. To yield immediately twenty-five sail of the line, and likewise to pay, at stated times, convenient for both parties, the sum of three hundred and fifty millions, was the demand. To this the agent had agreed, and perhaps more, by conquest. That the latter mode, which knew of no condition, freed them from fetters, and of course from the possibility of any future imputation of breach of treaty, and of violated faith. The agent, however, who was an ancient minister of that Government here, was suffered to remain, and treated with respect, whilst he was there issued to the troops to advance, and which were obeyed.

There arrived, about the same time, a deputation from the patriots who, associating with Mr. Van Staphorst, and one or two others, of those who were banished from their country, in 1878, endeavored to counteract the movement which was going on in the business of the Convention. It is to be supposed on the most friendly terms to the honour of the Convention. Before the entry into Amsterdam, they wished admittance to the bar, as well for that purpose, as to sound the disposition of the Convention in regard to the future fate of Holland. But, in that stage it was evaded, perhaps from policy; perhaps from the real imprudence of expressing any opinion upon that point, in the then state of affairs; or, perhaps, indirectly, in order to keep the Convention at that event. A letter was sent, in an address formalized on it, though, in other respects, adapted as was before intended. The answer of the President was respectful, but cautious: for whilst it breathed a spirit of patriotism, and of particular regard for the ancient virtues of the Belgian confederacy, and of course left them no cause of complaint, it carefully avoided all compromission of the Government itself.

What will be the future fate of those provinces is altogether uncertain, and must be, in a great measure, dependent on events. At present I am satisfied there is no settled plan on that head, nor, indeed, is it possible there should be, within so short a space of time. Many members, and among them some of distinguished weight in the Convention, seem disposed to extend the future boundary of the republic to the Rhine; and, of course, under within its limits all that part of those provinces lying on this side of that river. This idea was lately avowed by Bossy d'Angles, a member of the committee of public sales, in a speech delivered apparently by authority of that government. It appears to me, that in the opinion of several of the constitutional principles of that government, terms they would approve of, as to announce in that informal, and of course not obligatory manner, to the parties concerned, the ultimatum upon which they might expect it. In this he proposes that the republic shall be hereafter bounded by the "Netherlands rivers."" Behold this, however, as it may, I think it certain, unless the fortune of the war should inspire other counsels, that the whole of the provinces of the Holland, in the hands of this republic until its termination, and be made, in the progress, as instrumental to that event, in its favor, as circumstances will admit of. But, in any case, they be not dismembered, a revolution in their Government seems to be unavoidable. Their strong ports, their harbors, perhaps their fleet, will be under the control of France, and of course their councils likewise will be so. Ancient forms may, for a while, remain, but it is not possible, under circumstances of this kind, that they should be more than forms. Half the political regulations of the country, perhaps the whole, will proceed from the representatives of this republic with the army. Nor will any of its inhabitants, other than those of decided patriotism, be employed by them, in any office of trust or profit. Thus the weight and authority of the Government will be gradually transferred to the popular scale. The people at large will soon take the domination, and from that moment the ancient fabric, which was before tottering, will be levelled with the ground. The ordinary allurements of freedom are sufficiently great to the mass of mankind, to require no additional recommendation in its favor, and the hand of power must be strong where it is not pursued with effect; but, in the present instance, the addition will be great: for, as it is well known that this republic can repose no confidence in the existing Government, and that it might not be left in the hands of a single man, with which a revolution that which would succeed a revolution, so it must be equally obvious that its continuance will furnish a strong argument here for the dismemberment. This consideration, therefore, will add a new stimulus to all those who in clinically desire to preserve the independence of their country than become reduced into a few departments of France.

Before this great achievement, and which resembles more an event of less importance than those of modern princes, there was a collection of diplomatic characters, formal and informal, from several of the Powers at war, and others friendly to some of them, at Basel, in Switzerland, and who expected to be met there by some agents of the republic, for that purpose. But the visit was never paid, that prospect vanished, and it is said that some of them have retired home, and others arrived here to confer more directly with the Government itself. Count Carletti, from Florence, and Baron Stael, from Sweden, men said to be friendly to the Dutch revolution, and with those only who are known, and the latter is supposed rather to expect, than to confer with any of the Congress of the Hague, whose credentials he holds.

I herewith transmit to you some communications received from Mr. Skipwith, and which will show the state of the Bordeaux and St. Domingo claims: and I beg of you to be assured of the unremitted attention which I shall continue to pay to these concerns, and indeed to every other in which my countrymen are interested.

February 5th, P. S. Since the above was written, some details have been received of the success of the French in the United Netherlands, and by which it appears that everything which was predicted, in that respect, has been verified. Williamstadt, Breda, Gorcum, Bergen-op-Zoom, and the fleet, held by the ice in the Texel, are all taken. I enclose, however, the papers containing those accounts.
From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, February 19th, 1879.

Sir:

I was honored with yours of the 9th December, three days since, and by which I find that my third letter only had the second and third, though the entire series of documents were forwarded according to their respective dates, and by opportunities which promised security and despatch.

I read, with equal surprise and concern, the strictures you deemed it necessary to make upon some particulars of my conduct here, because I think it did not merit them, and trust, upon a further view of all circumstances, you will be satisfied with the explanation. In the first place, and however, I think proper now to communicate.

It is objected, that I addressed the Convention with a glow of sentiment not warranted by my instructions. Secondly, that I made public what was intended, and publicized it, instead of having a quiet conference with them before I met you, and drew it by them of course I thought it did not, and I now think so. The force, however, of this objection, is, I presume, comprised in the second: for, if the communication had been in private, and not in public, the objection, most probably, would not have been made. Upon this point, therefore, a more full and particular explanation is necessary, and, for this purpose, a full view of the circumstances and motives which influenced my conduct, equally so.

Upon my arrival here, I found our affairs, as it was known they were before I sailed, in the worst possible situation. The treaty between the two republics was violated. Our men, taken on board our vessels, were often abused, generally imprisoned, and treated, in other respects, like the subjects of the Powers at war with them. Our former minister was not only without the confidence of the Government, but an object of particular jealousy and distrust.

In addition to which, it was suspected that we were about to abandon them for a concurrent, and for which purpose, principally, it was believed that Mr. Jay had been sent there. The popular prepossession, too, in our favor, had abated, and was, in some measure, at a stand: for the officers of the fleets from America had unfavorable accounts of our disposition towards them. Thus the connection between the two countries hung, as it were, in the air; and I am convinced that, if some person possessing their confidence had not been sent, it would have been broken.

My first reception was marked with circumstances which fully demonstrated these facts, and showed how critical the ground was on which we stood. My reception was unqualified, or, at least, as unqualified as could be expected, to the committee, or the governing party in it, were disposed to delay my reception, throw me entirely out of view, and destroy altogether the effect of my mission. It was said, that, as my principles were with them, I ought, on that account, to be the more dreaded; for, if they confided in me, I should only build them asleep and prostrate, in the face of assertions on their part, that I was viewed with a jealous eye, and kept at the most awful distance. This deportment towards me was so observable, that it attracted the attention of the representatives of other Powers here, and was, most probably, communicated elsewhere.

Into what consequences this policy, which was hostile to us, might lead, I could not readily perceive; but I was alarmed on that head, for I well knew the ardent interest against us of Executive and sectional enmity, and in which shape it threatened to break out, pursued with passion, as I had reason to apprehend it would be, would not only injure our national character, but likewise disturb our internal tranquility, and, perhaps, involve us in war.

The arrival of the mission was, in fact, a step another to the side of that which were prosperous, I was fearful it would be taken. Thus circumstanced, what course did dictate that I should pursue? Did it become me to look on as a tranquil spectator of machinations that pertain'd to such mischief to my country? or, was it more wise, more consistent with the obligations of the trust I had accepted, to make a decisive effort to defeat them? After adopting the fairer counsel, in what line should that effort be directed, or by what means enabled to succeed? The doors of the committee, as already mentioned, were closed against me; and, had it been otherwise, knowing, as I did, the disposition of that body towards us, would it have prudent to have deposed those documents under its care, since they furnished the only means by which I was enabled to prove my mission, and present to the committee, which would produce, in the councils of that body, any change of sentiment, advised as it had been, and armed as it was, with a series of contrivances, and, in which it would place a greater confidence? I can assure you, and with great sincerity, that you may take it from me as far as you please (for we are not of a nature to insinuate zeal) that range of our affairs in their general relation to those of other Powers, and in which you deem my conduct defective, that the measure I adopted appeared to me not only the most eligible, but that, in the juncture of affairs, I thought it my indispensable duty to adopt it. Nor was it, I believe, the case of any part of our conduct upon which we felt the least regret for this nation and its Revolution, (though indeed the word was not used) the people at large were settled on the right side. The abettors of a contrary doctrine were, in a great measure, confounded; and as soon as the impression upon the public mind had time to react back upon the public councils, aided by the little incidents I caught at to inspire confidence, together with a change of the members of the committee, was the object, even in that body, though slowly, yet finally, completely accomplished.

But you intimate that I ought to have shunned this publicity, from the fear it might injure our depending negotiations with Britain and Spain. Had I seen cause to apprehend that consequence, I should certainly have been more averse to the measure. But that there was none, on the contrary that it would produce the opposite effect, was, in my opinion, certain. In demonstrating this, permit me to develop, according to my idea of it, the object of Mr. Jay's mission, and the contingencies upon which his success depended. This will show the relation which mine had to his, and more satisfactorily than I can otherwise do, the motives, in that respect, of my conduct.

I understood that the sole object of Mr. Jay's mission was to demand the surrender of the posts, and compensation for injuries, and was persuaded that his success would depend upon two primary considerations—the success of the French armies and the degree of public confidence, both of which were extremely important. Of these events, I concluded that his mission would fail: for we know that a long and able negotiation for the first object had already proved abortive, and we saw in the preceding year, when Tunon was taken, and fortune seemed to frown upon the arms of this republic, that an order was issued for those spolia- tions of which we so justly complain. We likewise saw afterwards, when the spirit of this nation was roused, and victory attended its efforts, that that order was rescinded, and some respect shown to the United States. Thus it appeared that our fortune, at least so far as depended upon Britain, and of course the success of Mr. Jay's mission, depended upon that of France.

It is just, therefore, that we could not redound to our advantage, and especially in the negotiation with Britain, without a good understanding and concert with the French Government: for without which, we could neither count upon success in negotiation, nor in case it failed, upon the fortunate issue of arms, if war should be appealed to. But I hoped that if we had not a perfect understanding with them, we were not unenthusiastic when we were not accommodated, we would join in the war against them: we could not accept it at the price of an equivalent, and thus pay again for what was already our due: nor could we expect it from the aforesaid, the justice, or the liberality of that court: for we well knew that, if it had possessed those virtues, we should have had nothing to do with it, had there not been some concert with France: for, without such concert, we might commence at the moment she was about to conclude whereby we should be left alone to contend with that Power, who would probably be supported by Spain. If, then, our good understanding with France was broken, or the necessary concert between us incomplete, Britain would only have amuse us till the crisis had passed, and then defy us.

If this doctrine is true, and it is admitted that the success of Mr. Jay's mission depends upon a good understanding between the French and ourselves, I cannot believe it would have been more than a doubtful one, were not the mutual effect would; and of course that, by exhibiting this public proof of it, instead of retracting, I forwarded essentially the object of that negotiation; and such, indeed, was my idea at the time; for I knew that the movement would be so understood on the other side of the channel; and in consequence, believed it would produce a good effect, and in which case the two things should be brought to me, or to the minister of whose business it was, the papers were laid exposed, and who assured me that, if it had been continued, Mr. Jay's success would have been immediate.

That the English administration would complain of this movement, and of me, was what I expected; but I knew that I was sure not to subvert the views of that administration, and trust to that, whilst I rested on my instructions, and performed my duty with integrity, although my judgment might occasionally err, as those of most men sometimes do, that no concession would be made to my discredit, in favor of that administration: on the contrary, that we should be firmly supported against its attacks by those who sent me here. I trust that this has been the case in the present arrangements, and upon which point I am more anxious upon public than personal account. But I well know that, if any such concession has been made, it was immediately communicated by its instruments here, and for the purpose of weakening the confidence of this Government in our own—a practice systematically pursued heretofore, and with the hope of separating, or at least of preventing, any kind of concurrence to the measures of this Government in the event of peace, the motive for greater caution would have been stronger. But the case was in every respect otherwise. Her fortunes were at the height of prosperity, and those of her enemies decisively on the decline. It was obvious that nothing was wanting to preserve tranquillity at home, or to strengthen hers. The other objects, but the good offices of this republic towards us. By the measure, therefore, I thought that everything was to be gained and nothing to be lost.

Upon the third point but little need be said. I have some time since transmitted to you a decree which carried the treaty into effect, and yielded the point in question. Satisfied I am, too, it was greatly forwarded, if it not absolutely obtained, by the manner in which it was urged: for a generous policy is better calculated to produce a good effect here, than a strict one: and other than in this light my declaration cannot be considered. Surely I did not concede the point, nor intimate an indifference upon it: on the contrary, I labored, with the greatest force of which I was capable, in behalf of that which I considered to be the interest of our country. I have not, I trust, been mistaken in my belief: the consequences have been as happy as I could wish, and our relations remain in a pretty prospect of being completely reestablished. I have, however, the object contained in your strictures upon my conduct, by stating the circumstances under which I acted, with my motives of action; and I presume satisfied you, that I did not merit it. But I cannot dismiss the subject without observing that, when I review the scenes through which I have passed, recollect the difficulties I had to encounter, the source from whence they proceeded, and my efforts to inspire confidence in our administration, I could not help feeling that my exertions were not altogether unattended with much dissatisfaction and apprehension. I cannot but feel mortified to find, that, for this very service, I am censured by that administration.

You have already seen, more accurately than I could have done, what was my motive in that part of the treaty we have been engaged to dispose of, and upon terms perfectly easy to us: terms, in short, which sought only the aid of our credit to obtain a loan from our own banks for an insconsiderable sum, to be laid out in the purchase of provisions, within our own country, and to be reimbursed, if possible, by themselves. But, by that intelligence, this disposition was checked, but not changed: for it is with the course of opinions, as with that of bodies, and which are not easily to be forced in an opposite direction, after they have decisively taken a particular one. I mention this for your information, not indeed in any sense as a matter of report, but still inclined to believe that, if the arrangement with England, or the negotiation with Spain, should fail, it is possible, provided a suitable attempt be made here before a peace is closed with those Powers, respectively, to accomplish the whole through the medium of the Netherlands; but perhaps countries of a different character would rightfully subject us to the imputation of a breach of neutrality. Well satisfied I am, that the full weight of its fortunes might be thrown with decision into our scale, and in a manner that would enable us to turn those fortunes to the best account in negotiation.

I am, Mr. Secretary, with the highest respect, your obedient servant, PHILADELPHIA, February 13, 1793.

P. S. I herewith enclose you a report from Mr. Skipwith, upon some cases that were noticed in your last dispatch; as likewise upon some others, upon which application will most probably be made to you, and whereby you will be enabled to give satisfactory information to the parties concerned.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

The last date which I have received from you, is of the 15th of September, 1794, and it has been only acknowledged by duplicates. It occasioned no small anxiety as to the issue of many points which you had brought before the French government; especially inclosed in a memorial respecting the stipulation between the United States and France, making goods free which are found in free ships. It has appeared only, in a translation, and there is ambiguity enough in its present dress to lead us to hope that the treaty of Tuscany, as it has been described at the beginning of the debate, to be in full force, may possibly be an exception still, to the general provision for condemning hostile property near neutral bottoms.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, February 18, 1795.

I have just been honored with your favor of the 2d December, and am gratified by its contents. The preceding one of the 3d will give me great uneasiness, but this has removed it. I sincerely wish my two first letters had reached you in the order they were written, as they would have prevented yours of the 3d December, by preventing the impression which gave birth to it.

Be assured I shall continue to forward, by all the means in my power, the objects of my mission, and I am persuaded that nothing of which might result from those efforts, addressed to the councils of a nation well disposed favorably to receive them. The object of this is to acknowledge the receipt of your last letter, and in the expectation that it will accompany, under the care of Mr. Aillet, my last dispatch, which was in answer to the preceding one.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 6, 1795.

Sir:

I avow myself of the opportunity by Mr. Adet, who leaves this to succeed Mr. Fauchet, of transmitting here with some communications which have lately passed between the committee of public safety and myself, upon the subject of our interesting claims with Spain; and which will serve not only still further to illustrate my former despatches upon that point, but likewise to show the precise ground upon which it now rests. I had thoughts of declining any further choice to modify them, until I was enabled to lay before the committee the project of Mr. Jay’s treaty with the English Government, and which was, and still is, daily expected by the return of Mr. Purvisance; but from this I was swerved by a report, that the outlines of a treaty were nearly adjusted between the representatives of this republic with the army, and some agent of Spain on the frontier, from the fear that the peace would be closed with that Power before our differences were compromised. Thus circumstance, I deemed it my duty, in conformity with my instructions, and the more especially, as they had now no right to make any inference with respect to that project other than I had stated to bring the subject more fully before them than I had before done. Among the papers enclosed, which comprise the whole of what passed between us upon this subject, you will observe a note of Merlin de Douny, and which, though given by a single member, and in reply to an informal application, yet, as it marks a remaining solicitude upon the transaction to which it refers, I have thought it equally my duty to transmit for your information.

No peace is yet made with Spain, nor indeed with any other Power, Tuscany excepted, which was before communicated; but it is still probable that one will be made with that Power, and likewise with Prussia. It is, however, well known, that England is against it; and that the whole line of the destruction of the war, so far as they were ever understood, are now in the state of most imminent danger of the republic was among them, that must of course be considered as abandoned. Or if the restoration of the ancient monarchy was the sole hope of accomplishing it by arms must now likewise be considered as gone. Nations acting entirely on the defensive, never dream of conquest. The only remaining to enhance the commerce of Powers can consist in the possibility of some internal commotion being excited by the scarcity of provisions, the derangement of their finances, or the divisions of their councils—calamities, it is true, or either of them, singly, provided it attained to a certain height, which it is admitted would be sufficient to counteract the efforts of even the most resolute of enemies to the state. But whether France is threatened with real danger from this source, or in either of those views, is the problem to be solved. Upon the two first points, I do not pretend at present to be able to decide with certainty; indeed, the best informed can only conjecture. Bread I know is scarce in some parts; and it is possible much distress may be experienced in those quarters, if foreign supplies are not obtained, and in great amount; but these are expected from
FRANCE.

It is probable, too, that this scarcity has been increased by the speculation of individuals, and in which case it will diminish as the exasperation

Nor am I skilled in their financial policy. When I arrived, the assignats were depreciated in comparison with specie, and the speculating parties sold them off for a hundred and ten sous. The price of wheat and the sums occasionally emitted, are wonderfully great, and the depreciation must follow as a thing of course. What measures will be taken with the paper is yet doubtful. Formerly, it had depreciated in equal or greater degree, and then it was elevated to par, by striking out of circulation all the bills of a certain description, securing the property of the nation against the runs, and the nation having been debarred by the mutable nature of the fundamental articles, regulated the price of every thing.

Whether some measures of the like kind will be again adopted, or whether any attempt will be made to appreciate the paper, is equally uncertain. Many consider the appreciation as an evil to be avoided, preserving the state of paper currency, and thinking it expedient to have a little private capital, and redeeming the whole at the rate it passed in the last stage of circulation. I think it probable this latter policy will finally prevail, as it is advocated with ability and zeal by some who were tutored in our school.

The subject, however, is still under discussion, and nothing absolutely decided on it. If this latter plan should be preferred, perhaps it may be advisable to appreciate the paper, or even prevent its depreciating, in time, at the rate at which it commenced. Its debt will be but small, and it will possess, besides the ordinary reserve of taxation, &c. national domains to an immense amount; equal, by estimation, to at least two hundred millions, sterling, in specie; supported during the 3d and 4th September, 1792, and the invasion of the Convention on the 23d, 1793, which...

I will, however, take a more accurate survey of this subject, and give you the result as soon as possible.

And upon the subject of those dangers which are presumed to menace the safety of this republic from the division of its brotherly love, I have but little to add at present. The details already furnished. The papers herewith forwarded, contain the report of the commission of twenty-one, upon the denunciation of Barrere, &c. and which finds cause of accusation. As soon as the report is printed, the denounced will be heard before the Convention, who will decide, by what is called the appel nominal, for their acquittal or trial; and in the latter case, they will, in consequence, be tried, and arraigned against my opinion. Their case has been previously abated, as one of them (Vader) has already done, and which it is wished, even by those most active in the prosecution, they all may do. This particular incident will not be new to you, and in other respects, the counsels and arguments of the king and ministers from the first, have been used to the subject. In contemplating the possible effects of this prosecution, or what may be called a division of the public councils, the friends of the Revolution have cause to regret that, since a decision upon the conduct of these members was taken, it was not sooner taken. If it had followed immediately after the execution of Robespierre, it would have been the subject of a party collision, and my opinion in reference to the danger which would not otherwise have existed: for by the delay, the twofold crisis of the trial, and of famine, or rather the scarcity of provisions, will take place precisely at the same moment; than which there certainly could not be a coincidence of events more favorable to the views of the coalced Powers, or unfavorable to those of the revolution. But I observe, by the course of this transaction, that, although the preponderating party has denounced, and may finally execute, these members, it has, notwithstanding, acted rather upon the defensive than otherwise. Had the prosecution been undertaken with that degree of zeal and vigor, of which so decided an event is always capable, they must long since have been carried away. Of this, I am now evidently convinced. I have no plan; nor indeed is it probable there was any on the other: for I am convinced that the real object of at least four out of five, on both sides, has been to complete the Revolution. The coincidence, therefore, must be deemed one of those unlucky, but fortuitous arrangements, forced by the course of events, not to be controlled, and under which the Revolution must console itself with the reflection, that although, in my possible view, it may prove injurious to their cause, yet, if it slides smoothly by, it will produce a correspondent benefit, by demonstrating to the world how deeply rooted the principles of the Revolution are in the hearts of the people.

But, does no danger threaten the republic from this source? In my opinion, (I speak of the present moment more particularly) none: for, from all those circumstances which have passed under my view since my arrival, I am satisfied that, whilst the majority of the Convention is on the side of the Revolution, it will be supported by the people, and I am even persuaded that, if the majority was against it, although, in consequence, it would be able to occasion great confusion, and do in other respects much injury, yet it would not be able to restore the ancient monarchy. In advancing this position, I reason not only from recent incidents, but from past events; and by which I see that the great mass of the French nation, through all the vicissitudes of the war, and succession of parties, was always on the side of the Revolution, provided with an unshaken confidence in that cause, not only by their own united confidence, but because they believed it to be true to the main object, and was, of course, the only solid rock upon which they could rest with safety. A variety of circumstances, marked in strong characters and by the subscription of the people to the latter of the two commands which I have before (if I may be permitted to repeat) tend to demonstrate the truth of this position. Nor have the citizens of this republic merited these last considerations, the other respects, for the reputation and licentiousness, often ascribed to them in foreign countries: for it is unquestionably true, that the great atrocities which have stained the different stages of the Revolution, and particularly the storming of the Tuileries, were committed by the party which had the misfortune to be finally terminated in the arraison and destruction of the Girondine party, did not proceed from a licentious commotion of the people. On the contrary, it is believed that many of the immediate agents in the first were not inhabitants of Paris, but belonged, I have little doubt at present, to the above said society, and some even from Italy, put in motion by some secret cause not yet fully understood. It is also accompanied, by the great mass of the people of Paris were ignorant of what was transpiring at the time of the transaction, and that those who knew of it were struck with the same horror that we were when we heard of it on the other side of the Atlantic. And the movement of the 31st of May, when they were summoned to the Convention, was a movement on their part, in obedience to the law, and for which they were regularly summoned, and commanded by the ordinary officers. It is said that the great mass knew nothing of the object to which they were to be made instrumental; that the secret was deposited with a few only in the Convention, such as Robespierre, Danton, &c. who governed the operation, and the Mayor of the city, the Ge- neve, and with others, but has never been declared in the name of marshals and municipal commandants. The party in the house which controlled the movement, knew how to turn it to good account. The Mayor, a partisan of Robespierre, &c. had a few days before presented a petition, demanding the arraison of the twenty-two members, and which was received, in the house, by a leading tender of the same party, that the measure of dis- contents, and which he said occasioned the movement in question, and threatened the annihilation of the Convention, could not be satisfied, unless those obnoxious members were arrested. And as the Girondine party did not control the movement, or know any thing about it, otherwise than as appearances announced, and which were tre- mendously increased, they were the objects of the operation, and which, it is said, will prove to be true, and the members in consequence arrested. Thus, by more finesse, and under a dexterous management, the Girondine party was completely overwhelmed, and the Monarchy party as completely established on its ruins, and the principles of the Revolution established. In a word, by the latter, were the object of terror, and the cause of the overthrow of the former, notwithstanding it was at the time of its deciding contest in time, and equally so in the public estimation.

These latter details may, perhaps, appear inapplicable to the subject; but, as I consider them of some importance, as they tend to demonstrate the influence of the Revolution in this city. It is known that the excise has many more immediately to threaten the welfare of the republic, I have thought proper to communicate them to you. The success of the Revolution depends upon the people. Whatever, therefore, unfolds the character and disposition of the people, and especially in relation to that object, must of course be useful. I was advised by your favor of the 5th December, that Mr. S[.] of New-York, was appointed consul for this city, and, upon which appointment, some considerations have occurred which I have thought it my duty to 88 suggestion. Permit me to ask, is he an American citizen; and if so, whether by birth or naturalization; and, in the latter case, whether he became such since the Revolution? If the last description, his arrival will subject me to great embarrassment, and for reasons given in my fourth letter, of the 18th October last and to which, with those few words, the comissary of foreign affairs to me, transmitted at the same time, I beg leave to refer you. I candidly think, if his situation is known, being a person deemed by the English law a subject of that crown, he will not be recognized, or if recognized, not without great reluctance. Shall I announce him, then, withholding a correspondence, which, from the fact, admitting it to be a fact? In case I do, and it is afterwards discovered, what will be the impression of this Government towards myself, and especially after what has passed between us on the same subject: finding that I have placed, without their knowledge, in office, and immediately in the presence of the public councils, a person of a description against which they had particularly objected? And that it will be discovered, and immediately, is most certain: for there are already letters for him here from England, and these will most probably be multiplied tenfold after his arrival; besides, the character, &c. of every foreign agent, and of every grade, being an object of systematic political inquiry, is always well known. But admitting the acquiescence of the Government in this in other views this subject merits attention. It is to be observed, that a great proportion of the business of our countrymen here is transacted with the Government. The adjustment frequently requires my official support. If, then, he does not possess the confidence of the Government, he will not only be unable to render that service to our countrymen which he has been expected from his station, but, as he will be thought officiously to frequent and familiarize communication with me, it will follow, that precisely that portion of distrust to which he is subject, will attach itself to me, and produce a correspondent effect, to a certain degree, upon every subject depending here in which we are interested. I know well that, if my fourth letter had been received, I should not have been placed in this dilemma; but I must act as I do. If it be not, I do not know. I conspire myself under the eagles but, by delaying his departure until that letter was received, put it in your power to reconsider the appointment.

P.S. March 9. Since writing the above, I have been explicitly assured by Mr. Pelet, a member of the diplomatic section of the committee of public safety, that, in confidence, Mr. Jay’s treaty contained nothing which would give uneasiness here; they had expressly instructed their agent, now negotiating with Spain, to use his utmost efforts to secure for us the points in controversy between the United States and that Power. In consequence, I thought proper to mend and introduce a supplemental clause, explanatory of that controversy, and which I likewise enclose with the report of Mr. Mountfloreux, by whom it was delivered. What the success of their endeavors in their behalf may be, is uncertain; but we cannot expect the conclusion of their own treaty will be long delayed, and that accordingly.

I had forgotten to notify you, officially, the present I had made to the Convention of our flag. It was done in consequence of the order of that body, for its suspension in its hall, and an intimation from the President himself, that they had none, and were ignorant of the model. I herewith send you a copy of my note to him accompanying it.

From the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Committee of Public Safety.

Paris, January 25, 1795.

I have thought proper to present to your view, in the enclosed paper, the situation of the United States in relation to the river Mississippi, and respecting which, a negotiation is now depending with the court of Spain. This paper opens fully this interesting subject in its relation to both republics, and which it is proper you should be correctly informed of at the present time. France can only assist in opening the river by inviting the American minister, Mr. Short, to act in concert with her when she shall conclude her treaty with that Power, and which, by her permission, I can easily accomplish, or by comprising it in her own treaty. I have no power to treat upon this subject, otherwise than by bringing it thus before you, for the purpose of ascertaining what your disposition is upon it, and which, with any comments you may be pleased to make, I shall be happy immediately to communicate to the American Government.

Notes respecting the river Mississippi, communicated to the Committee of Public Safety.

Paris, January 25, 1795.

The river Mississippi extends from about the forty-eighth degree of north latitude to the twenty-ninth, where it empties into the Gulf of Mexico, running nearly a north and south course, and through a tract of the most fertile country in the world. It bounds the United States to the west, from latitude thirty-one to its source; an extent, pursuing the course of the river, of about two thousand miles. Many rivers empty into the Mississippi on the east; the principal of which are the Illinois and the Ohio, and which, with their branches, spread through the whole of the western interior of the United States, and make it a most delightful region. Other rivers empty into it from the west, of which the Missouri is the most important. This latter has never been traced to its source, although voyagers have passed up it above one thousand five hundred miles. It is, however, believed, that it penetrates further into the bosom of the continent than the Mississippi itself.

The whole of that portion of the United States lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and which comprises about one-half of the territory within the said States, depends upon this river for the export of its productions to foreign markets. It comprehends a portion of the territory of several of the existing States; perhaps one-third of Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Virginia, the whole of the State of Georgia, the whole of the territory lying between the Ohio and the Mississippi, which has already been laid out into five separate States, and which are to be admitted into the Union with the same rights as the old States, when they shall, respectively, attain a certain number of inhabitants. Of these, it is proposed to settle one only at a time, and of which the first has already been thus conceived.

When we examine the extent of this territory; its fertility, superior to that of the old States; the felicity of its climate, lying all within the temperate zone; the kind and quality of its productions, such as hemp, flour, corn, in short every thing necessary in human life, protected in its infant settlements by the Government of the United States, and necessary to the maintenance of membership with them, we are compelled to appreciate it more highly than any other vacant tract known upon the globe.

Its settlement is of importance to all those European countries whose inhabitants are engaged in manufactures, because it will furnish, in abundance, rude materials for every species of manufacturing which have the advantage of the time, at the expense of the supplies, because it will furnish an exhaustless source of every species of provision; but it is of peculiar importance to those which have islands in the West Indies, because it lies in the neighborhood of those islands, the mouth of the Mississippi being nearly in the same latitude, and will furnish everything in demand there, such as lumber, provisions, &c.

But the commerce of this country, when settled, will depend upon the navigation of the Mississippi, and of course the settlement itself will depend upon the same cause. This was secured by a treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, in 1783, but has hitherto been purchased by the Spaniards, from motives usually unjust and illiberal. A negotiation, the object of which, on our part, is to open it, is, and has been, depending with that Power, since that time.

FRANCE.

At the time our peace was made with England, the importance of this country, was little known in her councils. It is said that her negotiators did not even know on which side of the lakes, and, of course, within whose jurisdiction, the forts, which have since been the subject of contention, lay. But its importance was soon after-derstood. There is now no doubt of it; it has been recognized by the Western people, in hopes either of gaining it to herself, or otherwise making it subservient to her schemes of policy. With this view she refused to surrender the posts, excited the Indians to wage war on our frontiers, encouraged Spain to refuse our right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and did us other injuries of the same kind. It is certain that the Western people will, sooner or later, open this river, either by negotiation or by force, and more than probable that England, retaining, as she still does, her resentment against the old States, for their inde-pedence, and against France for the aid given in that war, will watch the unawares of the Western people, on account of the obstructed navigation of the river, and improve it into an opportunity of separation from the old States, and connecting them with her interest in Canada, by undertaking to open the Mississippi to both countries. And with this view, it is said, that she has long had agents there to treat upon this subject; and that nothing have prevented her success but the attachment the people have to their brethren in the old States; their repugnance to become the sport of foreign politics, and which would follow their separation; and the particular extent they bear to that Power. Next to conquest, separation would be the most advantageous arrangement for Britain: for, in consequence, and especially if opened under her auspices, she would become the ally of the Western States, and play them off against the Eastern; whereby their importance and weight in the scale of nations would be diminished. If this be true, then, a view, that she was at the bottom of the late insurrection on the frontier, and which grew out of the contents proceeding from the occlusion of the river.

But the same motive which inclines England to promote the separation of the new from the old States, should dispose France to prevent it. And let it be plain to you, France, and to all the world, they remain united they will continue so; by the separation, therefore, Britain might gain, but France could not.

It is, then, the interest of France to keep the whole of this territory under the same Government; but this cannot be done unless the intrigues of England be defeated, and the Mississippi be opened under the patronage of the United States. It is, therefore, the interest of France to yield her aid to her ally to open this river, and which, at the present crisis, would most probably produce a decisive effect. Nor would her retribution be limited to those considerations only which have been already mentioned. Experience has shown that those alliances are not only the most beneficial, but likewise of the most durable, which are founded equally on the affection and the interest of the parties, and by this act of friendship, France would establish a claim to the gratitude of the American people, which, by pervading every quarter, would reach the heart of every citizen. It would be known to the present race and remembered by posterity, that, by the aid of France, the old States were enabled to gain their independence, and that, likewise, by her aid, the new States commenced their settlement, grew up in the enjoyment of their rights, and attained their maturity.

In the present state of the war with Spain, it is presumed that France may obtain what is here proposed; and, indeed, infinitely more, either in the islands or even in South America, and without the least difficulty. Her system is a system of freedom to the world, as well in respect to the rights of nations as of men. It is therefore hoped she will avail herself of the present opportunity, not only to verify that fact, but to manifest, at the same time, the pleasure with which she embraces every opportunity that occurs to promote the interest of her ally.

From the Committee of Public Safety to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

PARIS, 17th Pluviose, (February 6th, 1795) 3d year of the republic,

We have received, with your letter of 9th Pluviose, a note explanatory of the situation of the United States in regard to the river Mississippi.

We acknowledge, by the solicitude which you show in the negotiation of this affair, that nothing which can tend to confirm the bonds of friendship and harmony between the two first republics in the world is strange or indifferent to you.

We thank you for the ideas you have communicated to us. We will examine them profoundly, and we will communicate to you, without delay, our observations upon your note. But we appreciate, beforehand, the motives of this loyal communication.

CAMBACERES, MERLIN, & C.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

PHILADELPHIA, March 8th, 1795.

SIR: On the 16th ultimo I had the honor of writing to you at large; and on the 20th of the same month I received your letters of October 16th, November 7th and 20th, 1794.

Being uncertain whether I may not be required at the next moment to close this letter, I shall not undertake to answer your dispatches fully; though I will proceed as far as the hurry of the opportunity will permit.

I have the pleasure to inform you that the President much approves your attention to our commerce; and the merchants who are immediately interested, and to whom I have communicated your measures, think them judicious.

The temporary appointment of Mr. Skipwith, and his report, have been both well received. But the circumstances of this brave, dear secretary, the want of proper assistance to our consulates, and an ignorance of what you had done, caused a Mr. Pitcairn to be named consul for Paris, pretty early in the late session of the Senate. I shall send a general instruction to the consuls to obey the directions of the ministers of the United States. Should such a power be received from you, I shall regard it as a proof that you mean to use it in the most effectual manner.

Your observations as to passports have for some time occurred to me. Those which have been issued from this Department lately, have been governed by strict rules; and great reproach and calumny have fallen upon the chief officer, from the mouths of foreign aristocrats, who are a kind of half-fledged citizens of the United States, by having resided therein a few months.

Your history of the Jacobin societies was so appropriate to the present times in our own country, that it was conceived proper to furnish the public with those useful lessons; and extracts were published, as from a letter of a gender friend in France, to a friend in America.

Last night the treaty with Great Britain arrived. It will remain undisguised by the Executive until the 8th of June next, when the Senate will assemble to deliberate on its ratification. I perceive that Mr. Fauchet is very uneasy, but upon what grounds, which are justifiable, I know not. The posts, and the spoliations of commerce, will never be of such consequence as then, if the disputes of their frontier people will, sooner or later, open the frontier. Our trade may also be regulated by any treaties which we please; and no other Government can find cause of offence, unless we derogate from its rights. You are acquainted with the restrictions on Mr. Jay, against the taking of our engagements with France and, as far right, the refusal of a proper aid to the countries we converted. To speak, I have not discovered any reasonable ground for dissatisfaction in the French republic: for it cannot be supposed that the French nation would be displeased that our disputes with other nations should be concluded. But you will not judge from what I say that my opinion is formed whether the treaty will or will not be ratified. However, your ideas as to Denmark and Sweden, though it was always a nation and a friend of less importance. I shall not now answer your proposition, or rather intimation, to a certain concert, until a future opportunity, and

I have just received a letter from Mr. Jay of the 5th of February," in answer to mine of the 17th January preceding, and by which he declines to communicate to me the purport of his treaty with the English Government, although he had previously promised it. As he has explicitly declared himself to this effect, I consider the business, of course, closed between him and me and should I make a further comment on the subject, I am not otherwise impelled by the style of his reply, which is obviously addressed more for your consideration than mine. To you, therefore, my comments upon that reply shall also be submitted.

Mr. Jay says that he has no right to communicate the treaty, since it belongs exclusively to the Governments which have agreed to it; which is, I think, a mistaken principle, that the ministry has the same right to communicate with his Government only. If this proposition is true, which (especially if no latitude is given him by his instructions) I am willing to admit, it follows that, as the injunction of secrecy applies to the whole instrument, it must, of course, to every part. It was absurd to say that, in the gross, or as an entire thing, it must be kept secret; and yet it may be said that it may be open to the House, having in his three several letters communicated a particular article, and promised, in the second, the whole; but he likewise says that the communication was intended to be confidential, or, in other words, to be secret for the support of his Government. Will his letters bear that construction? Does it appear as if the communication was intended merely to guard on our part, the treaty, the treaty is in no shape to be announced to me an event favorable to our country? On the contrary, does it not appear, from each of his letters, that he had anticipated the disquietude of this Government upon the subject of the treaty, and wished to remove it; and that the communication promised, and deferred for the purpose of secrecy, and to be used for public purposes? In short, had I been in a private station, is it probable he would have written or communicated any thing to me on the subject? Certainly, however, it is, that in no view was it possible for me to consider the communication promised, tocul-treated as a confidential one, as imposing on me any other restraint than that of caution, whilst it covenanted hereafter misconduct, and should the communication here (or subsequently) be disclosed to the public, it might be easily inferred that such information was imparted to me, un guarded by the confidence in which the treaty was to be kept secret for the support of his Government. As I really believed, at the time I wrote to Mr. Jay, that he intended to make the communication in question, and likewise concluded, from his own assurances, as well as from other circumstances, that the treaty comprised in it nothing which must cast further light on the subject, I thought I could not better inform you, or express my views, or the interest of our country, (especially as Mr. Morris had taken the liberty of speaking to me of the confidential person for it.) You will therefore judge of my surprise when, instead of the communication expected, I received his letter of the 5th of February, containing an absolute refusal to make it.

But in reviewing now his several letters, it is difficult for me to say what he intended to do, or what his real object was in writing them. For he says in these, that he is not at liberty to disclose the purport of his treaty, and yet promises it: that he will give me the contents, or principal heads, to enable me to satisfy this Government, but yet will give them only in confidential, and, of course, under an injunction that will put it out of any power to give the satisfaction in question. And, finally, when application is made, upon the basis of his own letters, for the information in question, and for the purpose by him contemplated, he not only refuses to comply with what he had promised, but erminates this Government for entertaining any uneasiness or making any inquiry on the subject.

We shall treat the whole thing upon the footing that the letter is not a refusal of my request. The right of the present instance, the justice of the demand, on the part of the latter, is of course admitted. There may, indeed, be some merit in offering it before the demand is made: but to make the offer, and then recede from it, subjects the party thus acting to an additional proportional reproach. Had Mr. Jay, however, chosen to place himself in this dilemma, from me he would have heard nothing more of the subject. I should have lamented, it is true, that he was not possessed of information that might be useful to our affairs here; but there the business would have ended: for both his promise and my application were, and still are, unknown to this Government. But to recede in the manner he has done, putting his refusal on the ground of national dignity, &c. is neither consistent with candor, nor the true spirit of things.

Had Mr. Jay confined to me the information in question, and in due time, and which it is obvious he thought himself in duty bound to do, I should then have become responsible for a proper use of it; and I am satisfied, admitting it to be as by him represented, good use might have been made of it; for I should not only have been enabled thereby to quiet their fears, and whose legitimacy he acknowledges by his efforts to remove them, and silence a thousand unfortunate insinuations whispered about by the enemies of both countries, but by the frankness of the communication, have most probably made the incident the means of conciliating, instead of weakening, the friendly disposition of our allies; and it would have been a great diminution of the anxiety on my side, and in a good measure, I believe, the anxiety of our Government, to know pretty certainly, from my own knowledge, (being the minister on the ground, and responsible for the truth of the declaration) that the treaty did not interfere with our engagements with this republic, but that, being a mere project, subject to rejection, &c. ought not to be published, it would have been satisfactory. And had the communication been sent to this Government, and published, it might have been my country, (which had been my chief object in thus offering it) there is that good, and I am certain of it, which it was not to be employed in any manner; but to give it, and without the least hazard on our part, in the negotiation with Spain, as likewise in that with England, (in case Mr. Jay’s treaty was rejected) that this was the way to do it. In short, that, if it was necessary to gain the approbation of this Government to any thing in that treaty, which it would otherwise disapprove, that this was the way to do it. Nor can I see any concision in such a line of conduct. On the contrary, between nations allied as we are, and especially when past and recent circumstances are considered, I deem it the most...

nominous, as well as the soundest policy. Mr. Jay, however, is now of a different opinion, and for the future I shall not disturb him in the enjoyment of it.

You intimated to me in last November that Mr. Pinckney was commissioned as envoy extraordinary for Spain, upon the subject of the Mississippi; and you have seen by my last, how far I had succeeded in calling the attention of his Majesty to that object. It is probable Mr. Pinckney will pass through France, as well as every other Port on his mission. In case he does, I will most certainly open to him every thing that has taken place here on that subject, and endeavor, according to the plan he shall prescribe, to render him, in every respect, all the services in my power. I have already intimated to Mr. Short, by a confidential meeting, that I would undertake as the good offices of the government, in which subjeet, the most steady, the most uniform, and the most unerring policy, and in which I am most anxious for success. It is, therefore, that, in view the most favorable prospect of a successful termination of this interesting business, the completion of which will reflect so much honor upon the administration by which it may be accomplished.

The questions which are considered of the greatest importance, the commanding general, has surrendered, with all the forces immediately under his command; and likewise undertaken to quell a small remaining body of about one thousand, which yet holds out. It is said the liberty of religion, granted by a late decree, terminated this war. A short time, however, will now disclose whether this is a true opinion, or the general favorable aspect of the present moment, is real or delusive; since, if there is a force in the union opposed to the establishment of sufficient strength to make head against it, and which I do not think there is, I doubt not it will soon show itself.

PHILADELPHIA, April 7th, 1795.

Sir:

My last letter, of March 8th, 1795, has been forwarded to you by duplicates. It will have anticipated the subject of your private letter of December 18th, 1794, though it is by so many means so extensive as one which I should have concluded before this time, but for a constant round of interruptions, which I have not yet been able to repel. I am in formed, that Mr. Trumbull has proceeded to the most positive step which you have suggested. You will have been informed by my letter of the 8th ultimo, that "the step is viewed here as a very strong one" and, notwithstanding the rapid successes which have attended the arms of our ally, we steadily direct our course to the character of neutrality which we profess, and, therefore, the more it is examined, the stronger it appears. You will hear from me shortly, in a more particular manner, concerning it, and the style which, in our negotiations at Paris, ought, in my judgment, to be observed. But I must be permitted to remark, that the "invariable policy of the President is, to be as indepen dent as possible, of every nation upon earth; and this policy is not assumed now for the first time, when, perhaps, it may be insidiously preached by some, who, lean to Great Britain, to prevent a tendency to France; but it is wise at all times, and, if steadily pursued, will protect our country from the effects of commotion in Europe. France, at this day, in the eye of the President, as she has always been, cordially embraced, and no event could be more afflicting to him than a suspicion of the purity of our motives in regard to that republic. But, without a steady adherence to principles, no Government can defend itself against the animadversions of the world, nor procure a permanent benefit to its own citizens.

Cases of spoliation and injury, according to the list subjoined, will accompany this letter, as subjects to which your attention and zeal are requested.

The prints, which have not been hitherto sent, are also prepared by Mr. Taylor.

Until a few days hence, I must beg you to accept this letter as the forerunner only of a more copious one, upon our affairs in France.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, April 14th, 1795.

Sir:

I was lately favored with a letter from Mr. Jay, of the 19th of February, by which I was informed that the bearer, Colonel Trumbull, who had copied and knew the contents of his treaty with the English Government, was instructed to communicate the same to me, because I was an "American minister, and in which character it might be useful to me; but that I must receive it in strict confidence, and under an injunction to impart it to no other person whatever. As I had explicitly stated to Mr. Jay, in my letter by Mr. Purviance, the only terms upon which I would concur in the mediation, and which had done, as well for the purpose of covering my engagement with the committee, formed after the receipt of his first letter, and when I expected no further information from him on the subject, as of preventing the transmission of it in case it contained the slightest circumstance which might be objectionable here, I could not otherwise than be surprised by the contents of this letter. To withhold the communication at all, or to hedge up the information within limits, was against the wishes of both parties. The substance of the letter, with which I was provided, was to offer, after the expiration of some months, and when it was expected from America, and upon terms which I had assured him I could not receive it, to say nothing of the impossibility of comprehending how such a step, unavailing to me, could be a service to a people, as a profound secret, was unexpected. I mentioned to him that it was obvious that, whilst the condition insisted in sending me to promote thereby the public interest, it would unavoidably tend, in some respects, to subject me to additional embarrassment in my situation here. I was likewise apprized that Colonel Trumbull did not consider himself at liberty to make the communication in question, unless I asked for it; and by which it was understood that I bound myself to accept it on the terms proposed, adding thereby to the injunctions of Mr. Jay, the additional obligation of private stipulation. The dilemma, therefore, with which I was threatened, was of a peculiar kind: for, if I accepted and withheld the communication from the government, and if I did not so, the question of the character of that treaty would excite a ferment here, and offer it, after the expiration of some months, and when it was expected from America, and upon terms which I had assured him I could not receive it, to say nothing of the impossibility of comprehending how such a step, unavailing to me, could be a service to a people, as a profound secret, was unexpected. I mentioned to him that it was obvious that, whilst the condition insisted in sending me to promote thereby the public interest, it would unavoidably tend, in some respects, to subject me to additional embarrassment in my situation here. I was likewise apprized that Colonel Trumbull did not consider himself at liberty to make the communication in question, unless I asked for it; and by which it was understood that I bound myself to accept it on the terms proposed, adding thereby to the injunctions of Mr. Jay, the additional obligation of private stipulation. The dilemma, therefore, with which I was threatened, was of a peculiar kind: for, if I accepted and withheld the communication from the government, and if I did not so, the question of the character of that treaty would excite a ferment here, and offer it, after the expiration of some months, and when it was expected from America, and upon terms which I had assured him I could not receive it, to say nothing of the impossibility of comprehending how such a step, unavailing to me, could be a service to a people, as a profound secret, was unexpected. I mentioned to him that it was obvious that, whilst the condition insisted in sending me to promote thereby the public interest, it would unavoidably tend, in some respects, to subject me to additional embarrassment in my situation here.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

But the mission of this gentleman here, though, according to my information of him, a worthy and a prudent man, produced an effect of a more serious kind. I was soon advised, by a person friendly to the United States, and heretofore friendly and useful to me, that his arrival had excited uneasiness in the public councils, and would probably evertheless occasion a temporaryוקן. It followed, therefore, I think, that in consequence, no account of the contents of that treaty: for it would hardly be credibly, after this, considering the relation between Mr. Jay and myself, that I knew nothing of those contents. Upon what other motive, it would be wise to believe, was the refusal of a conference, or, more properly, of a conference with me, on the part of the other direction, would be deemed a fallacious one? He added, that the wisest precautions were necessary, on my part guard me against any unjust imputation; since, through that, the interest of my country might, at the present crisis, be essentially wounded. As I had anticipated, in some measure, the effect, I was mortified, but not surprised, by the new communication. I had suspected this, but had been wronged by it. I had always considered myself privately as my public character, to place the integrity of my own conduct upon grounds which could not be questioned.

There appeared to me to be but one mode by which this could be done, and which was by making known to the committee what had passed between Mr. Jay and myself to state the terms upon which he had offered the communication; and the other was, to accredit my report of what I had been told. Both these were equally receive, was a painful task; but as I had no other alternative left, but that of exposing myself to the suspicion of known, from the beginning, the purport of Mr. Jay's treaty, and uniting with him in withholding it from them, which could not, I feared, escape the suspicion of spurning it. I, therefore, resolved to confide in the committee, consequence, and made the representation as above, repeating

Mr. Jay's motive for withholding the communication, as urged by himself: "That it belonged to the sovereign power alone to make it." &c. It was replied that it could not otherwise than excite uneasiness in the councils of the day, and, in a word, that I should confide it to no public personage. It was resolved, instead of within a committee of which I could not give in particular, America had stepped forward and made a treaty with that Power, the contents of which were so care-and strictly withheld from this Government: for, if the treaty was not injurious to France, why was it withheld from her? Was it prudent for one ally to act in such a manner in regard to another, and, especially, under the present circumstances, and at the present time, as to excite suspicions of the kind in question? I assured them, generally, as I had done before, that I was satisfied the treaty contained in it nothing which could give them une-siness; but if it did, and especially if it weakened our connexion with France, it would certainly be disapproved of the day, and to this I added, that I was resolved to confide in the committee, and induce them to consider the matter. They instantly resolved, the next day, to communicate to Mr. Jay, for the purpose of Colonel Trumbull, for he merited the confidence; but I was surprised that Mr. Jay should write me it was to be communicated to me only as a public minister, &c. to be imparted to no one else, and that Colonel Trumbull, however deeply impressed he might be after his arrival here with the new situation of his country, and however the advice, and that of his several correspondents, was to con-municate the same to a third person, to be communicated to me, under no injunction whatever. I was, however, possessed of the paper in question; and it was my duty to turn it to the best account, for the public interest, that circumstances would now admit of. It was, it is true, the most informal of all informal communications, and one of consideration, and of which the meaning might be inferred by reading between the lines; yet I was sure that the nature reflection, and, the more especially as I did not wish to meet the committee again on that point and the other, that I was not supposed to preside over the deliberation of the committee, not only of the concerns of the treaty, but of the conduct of the committee, and the measures which were to be taken in confidence the public interest; whereas I thought the conduct of Commissioners for the rights belonging to the members, on my part, that they might confide in the credulity of the parties. The paper was presented to Merlin de Douay, with the consists suggested; and since, which I have neither heard from the committee, Colonel Trumbull, nor Mr. Jay, on the subject.

I intimated to you in my last, that I was persuaded, if there was a force here able and willing to make head against the Revolution, it would soon show itself, but that I was of opinion none such existed. This present has been since verified by a great and interesting example. The storm, which I thought I saw gathering, after rising to its heaven, and, heretofore, opposite classes of society, but united now for the common purpose of disturbing the pubic tranquility. The prayers, which were filled in the time of Robespierre, and opened under the more humane administration of the present day, had discharged upon the city an immense crowd of the ancient aristocracy, and who soon gave proofs that the severe discipline they had undergone had not eroded the properties they were required under the reign of the ancient court. As the present administration had rescued them from the guillotine, and to which they were otherwise inevitably doomed, it was at least entitled to their gratitude. This slight tribute, however, was not paid for that important service. On the contrary, these were among the most active in fomenting the revolution, and, in the last of the late disturbances, were the persons most affected. The partisans of the franchised, or rather routed, Jacobins and their adherents, were seen marshalled by its side, and acting in harmony with the.

These two classes of people, and who were heretofore at endless war with each other, now combined, formed a force of some strength, and excited, in the minds of many well disposed persons, serious apprehensions for public safety.

The increasing scarcity of bread, and which menaced an unavoidable diminution of the ordinary allowance, contributed much to increase the apprehension of danger. A deficiency in this article in Paris, under the ancient gogernment, was a source of innumerable disturbances. A panic frequently ensued, when the public had reas-tration, to guard against such deficiency as the greatest of public calamities. Abundant stores were, in consequence, when it was possible to provide them; and, let the scarcity or price be what it might, in other quarters, the ordinary allowance, and nearly at the ordinary price, was distributed, as in times of greatest plenty, by the hands of the police, in the streets of Paris, and, in the cities, and at a proportionate rate. In the present state of affairs, which announced the approach of a deficiency, announced likewise that of a crisis extremely important in the history of the Revolution. The most firm knew it was an experiment yet to be made, and from which the most would be concluded upon no possible benefit; but, from the success it might have, it might be foreseen, that the most; but, on the other hand, the deficiency of bread, if that was the fact, would be made the pretext; and, as the complaint, being addressed to the wants of all, would excite a general sympathy, it was feared that such deficiency would tend much to increase the strength of the insurgent party. In every view, therefore, there was no cause for alarm. The measures which were taken remained, for those whose duty it was to sustain it, than that of yielding under, or meeting, it with firmness, and passing through it as well as possible.

As soon as it was known that a diminution of the ordinary allowance was unavoidable, it was resolved to make it known, that it might be the subject of a popular discussion. The Convention, on the 13th of May, decided to bring forward the subject for discussion at some future day. The second stage in the discussion was opened on the 20th of May. It was then stated that the object of the measure was to save subsistence, and to enable the people to enjoy tranquillity. The discussion was continued through the month of June, and formed the subject of a great number of debates and motions, which were afterwards published. The measure was passed, and the people were promised that it would be abandoned in a short time.

About a month after this, on the 1st of April, (12 Germinal) a more numerous body, consisting principally of workmen from the Faubourg of St. Antoine, presented itself likewise before the hall, demanding admission to the bar of the Convention; and, upon some pretext, and in violation of the usual forms, immediately sitting down in the crowd in the hall, and declaring that, if there were in the hall perhaps three or four thousand, and, in the vacant external space around it, as many more. The proceedings of the Convention were suspended: the president, however, and the members, kept their seats, declaring that, as their sitting was violated, they would do no business. Indeed it was then impossible to do anything, had the members continued to sit, they would have been obliged to run away, as the chair cries that the measure was a violation of the law. 'Liberty to the patriots,' meaning some of the accomplices of Robespierre, could alone be heard. They continued in the hall about four hours, from two to six in the evening, offering, in the intermin, no violence to any of the members of the Convention. The measures which were proposed to be adopted in this stage.

At six in the evening the Convention resumed its deliberations, beginning by declaring its sitting permanent, and progressing by a review of the movements of the day, which were well understood, and freely discussed. By this time, it was too, it was decided by accounts from every quarter that the sense of the city was decidedly pronounced in favor of the Convention, and that all classes of those who belonged to the city, and the province, were determined to return to their duty. The sitting continued until six in the morning, in the course whereof a decree of banishment was passed against the accused members, and of arrestation against eight or nine of the Mountain party; which latter list was afterwards increased to about eighteen; and both of which decrees have since been carried into effect, by sending the former to the isle of Oleron, and the latter to the castle of Hain, in the department of Somme: and thus ended the commotion which was so long gathering, and which menaced, at one time, not to arrest the progress of the Revolution, (at least such was my opinion) but to occasion much trouble, and stain its page with new atrocities.

In the course of this day, the services of General Pichegru, who happened to be in Paris, and was appointed commandant of the national guard, were of great importance to his country. His activity was great, for he was always on horse, and passing from one quarter of the city to another; and his arrangements in disposing of the cannon and military force were wise. His name too was of great utility, for it tended equally to elevate the hopes of the people, and to increase the tranquillity of those who remained. But had the Convention been less fortunate in the event would have been different; but I am satisfied that his presence contributed much to hasten the restoration of order, and to preserve it afterwards.

By this event, which is called the complements to the 8th of Thermidor, and which forms the catastrophe of the Revolution, all that is appertaining to the complements is published, not only in this city, but throughout the republic in general. The scarcity of bread, it is true, still continues, but yet no murmuring has been since heard on that subject. The moderate party, and which, in principle, I decem the same with that which was overwhelmed on the 31st of May, with therefore commence its career under a state extremely favorable to its own reputation, and to the liberty and property of France. The fate of its late antagonist, if there was no other motive, and which was precipitated by the general wish of France, and of all other nations not in league against the French republic, must furnish a solemn and abominable admonition to shun its example. The opposite principles, too, upon which it is founded, being the average of all the times, at variance with the highest prudence, as well as with the happiness of mankind, would lead to anarchy, whose partisans were lately combined in an effort to crush it, promises to secure in its measures some stability in the observance of those just and honorable principles which it professes.

The fact is, that the time past, the views of past events are directed toward the establishment of the constitution, and some motions of this kind will be necessary before select committees, appointed to prepare the several organic laws necessary to introduce it. An opinion is likewise entertained by many that the constitution in question is very defective, and ought to be amended before it is put in force. A discourse to this effect was lately delivered by Pelet, a respectable and well informed member, and the same sentiment was then avowed by others. But whether this be an attempt of this kind (should it be formally made) will succeed, or whether the general solicitude to put the constitution in force, however defective it may be, in the hope of amending it afterwards, will prevail, is yet uncertain.
Since the fortunate issue of the late commotion, a treaty of peace was concluded with Prussia, at Basle, in Switzerland, of which I enclose you a copy. The import of the fourth and fifth articles gives cause to suspect that some stipulations exist which have not been communicated, and it is believed by many that it is agreed between the parties that France shall retain the Prussian territory on the left of the Rhine, in lieu whereof she is to take and convey to Prussia the territories of the 2d, 12th, and 13th centuries. It is also probable, if the war continues another campaign, that Prussia will be seen arranged as a party on the side of France. The latter considers the old connexion with Austria as broken, and wishes to supply it by one with Prussia; and, provided satisfactory arrangements are, or shall be hereafter, formed for the purpose of raising the latter power at the expense of the former, as well as that of England. The negotiation with Spain is also said to be far advanced, and will most probably soon be closed. It is likewise reported that a person, or more than one, from England, is now in Paris, upon the pretext of treating for an exchange of prisoners, but, in truth, for the more substantial one of treating, or at least of sounding the disposition of that great foreign power. Upon this point, however, I hope to be able to give you, in the course of a few days, more correct information than I now can.

From Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 17, 1795.

Sir,

I was yesterday honored with yours of the 8th of March, the only one received since that of the 5th of December, and was at the same moment favored with the company of Mr. Fitzcairn, who, having just arrived, had called to present his commission of vice consul for this city, to be recognized as such.

I informed you in my letter of the 6th of March, and for reasons in part before explained, that the arrival of this gentleman would subject me to an unpleasant dilemma for, if it was known that he was a British subject, although he had likewise become an American citizen, I doubted much whether he would be received. That, in strict propriety, I ought to communicate the fact, if it was so: for, after what had passed between us, upon a subject of such importance, the ultimatum addressed by the substitute of a nation to another nation, by an agent, can never be thought to be performed except by some act or declaration which may be compared to, and which must arrest the attention of the world as a declaration of its will. I felt, therefore, myself to the imputation of the want of candor, and that, in any event, if he were established, however correctly I might personally act, the circumstance of his being a British subject, would not only lessen his weight, and prejudice to the good of our commercial affairs hereafter, but, to a certain degree, and from causes that are obvious, lessen mine likewise. The idea that this might amount to an additional weight upon a diplomatic agent of such importance. By his arrival, therefore, this embarrassment was realized. The commission of the President is the law to me, and upon every principle it is disgraceful to suspend its force; but yet the nature of the trust reposed in a public minister, seems to imply in him a discretionary power to control, according to his judgment, incidents of this kind. It is not, therefore, that there is any cause or foundation for complaint with the commission, but when it is necessary to prevent a public detriment. Upon mature consideration, therefore, I have thought it best to withhold the official communication of his appointment from the President, until I shall hear from you in reply to the letter; and the more especially, as a few months have elapsed. In consequence I communicated this decision to Mr. Fitzcairn, with the motives upon which it was founded, and was pleased to observe that he appeared to be perfectly satisfied with the propriety of it.

I observe, by this letter, that the treaty concluded by Mr. Jay with Great Britain did not arrive before the 50th of December, or even the month of January. It was dated to the 8th of November, and is to be kept secret. I regret equally this delay and secrecy; the delay, because, if it is not approved, it may become more difficult, in the probable course of events, on this side the Atlantic, to obtain a remodification of it; and the secrecy because the jealousy that was at first imbibed by this Government of its contents, will of course remain for the same spectator, by whom the advice of a foreigner, or the opinion of a foreign minister, is considered with more suspicion. Having too explained the object of this mission, whilst its issue was uncertain, they think it strange that the result should be now withheld. Upon this point, however, I have nothing new to add. I have already communicated to you, in my letter of the 6th of March, that I had wanted to act, and wished to act in order to inspire this Government with a confidence, either that the treaty in question contains in it nothing improper, or that it will not be ratified in case it does.

Your last letter gave me the first intelligence upon which I based the opinion that Colonel Humphreys was in America. By your last, I see, you have fully possessed me of your views in respect to the practical points on the subject, and assured you, long since, that it would be easy to obtain from this Government its aid upon that point, and it is certain that its aid with each, and especially Algiers, will come, if the power of the regency is the strongest, in the United States, would be of the greatest importance. The power of France is at war against Austria, Spain, England, Portugal, and great feats they all, and, in consequence, conclude that she will be more powerful than all united, and respect her accordingly. I have frequently been told, in private conversation, by the members of the committee, that they were ready to run us all the service in their power in that respects and I should long since have requested the Government to make our peace there, in pursuance of the plan commenced by Mr. Morris, and I had not been insensible to the advances made in the hands of Colonel Humphreys, and feared, by such interference, that I should embarrass the views and measures of our Government. I shall be ready, however, to act in whatever line you may think proper to direct, and shall endeavor, and without any particular commitment on our part, to keep the committee in the same state of preparation.

In general, our commercial affairs progress as well, all things considered, as could be expected. Transactions of old standing have not lately formally pressed, because I knew that the Government was embarrassed on the score of finance, and because I thought it would be better to wait the issue of the business depending with you in June next. Mr. Skipwith, however, does every thing in his power to forward those objects, and perhaps with as much effect as would be possible under any pressure that could now be made. But, in the direct or current commerce, our countrymen enjoy all the privileges that the Government can give them; and though delays are sometimes experienced, in the partial movements in the part of this Government, it has been done in a manner as to keep us constantly closed in a manner satisfactory to the parties. The profits which some of them have made, and continue to make, according to report, are great, beyond example. In truth, our countrymen are gradually planting themselves in commercial houses throughout the republic, and engaging in the commerce of France to an extent which, whilst it is increased as the treaty progresses, is likely to increase. It means thereof, not only personal acquaintance and connexions are formed by the citizens of each with the other, respectively, but their common wants and common capacities will be better understood.

The claim of fifteen thousand dollars, in old-standing suits, would be admitted without interest, and that it ought to be so understood at the treasury. I omitted it in my more early applications to this Government, because I wished to progress with the greater objects first, and more latterly for the reasons above suggested. I conferred, however, on the subject with Mr. Adet, and presume he will allow it as a thing of course; but if he does not, upon notification thereof to the committee, and which I will immediately make when so advised by you, he will certainly be instructed to do it.

Since my last, Paris, and the republic in general, have enjoyed a state of perfect tranquility. Every little disturbance which ensued for a time the movement of the 3d of July, [12th (French)] and there was one or two of the smaller kind which did ensue, subsisted almost of itself, and in each instance without force, and of course without bloodshed. Thus the authority of the Convention prevails, although it is supported by the common sense and the common interest of the citizens of Paris only; a thing deemed heretofore impracticable under existing embarrassments. Certain it is, that, if the Government had been in the hands of a king, or any other description of person, the same that of the people themselves, we should have seen, in the course of a few weeks past, a succession of many revolutions of the ministerial kind, and which would have, perhaps, despatched eventually any king that ever reigned here. The distress of the people, on account of the scarcity of bread, since that time, has been of that of a besieged town.
They have been constantly upon allowance, and which was latterly reduced to two ounces, and sometimes less, per day. My family, which consists of fourteen persons, is allowed two ounces of wine per day, and twenty ounces of bread, which is as far below the allowance of the French public body, as the quality of the latter is probably the poor: for at a great expense (nearly forty dollars per barrel) I am supplied. The accounts which we have of the distress of the aged, the infirm, and even of children, are most afflicting; yet calmness and serenity are seen everywhere, complaints diminish, and that ferocity against the enemy, of which the whole nation was at first so ready, was succeeded by the animosity of contending parties, and most probably increased by foreign influence, has entirely disappeared. In this moment they all look to America for bread, and most fervently do I join them in prayer that our countrymen may speedily bring it to them. If they can make out for six weeks, they are safe; for by that time be may have arrived, from present prospects, they may be in a better situation in the interim than they now are, and most probably not in a worse.

In the line of negotiation, nothing has been concluded since the treaty with Prussia, and which was ratified by both parties soon after it was signed. Sir F. Eden arrived at Rochefort, from whence he notified his arrival to the under guard until the arrival of an agent from the committee, who was instructed to receive and report his propositions to that body, provided they embraced any other object than an exchange of prisoners; but in case they did not, the British government would not be bound to attend to their propositions, but would be prepared to treat for an exchange of prisoners. Have you no other power? Let us settle this point first; we shall be together, and may afterwards talk on what we please. But have you no other power? Your answer to this question may settle this and every other point in a word; if you have, I will receive what you will be pleased to communicate; if you have not, our business is at an end. Mr. Eden replied, he had none and thus they parted; the agent for Paris, and Mr. Eden for London; the latter being apprised what the wish of the committee was in that respect.

It is said that a treaty is lately concluded with the commissioners from Holland, by which the independence of that country is acknowledged, and an alliance offensive and defensive formed, upon terms which promise to be satisfactory to the parties. I will enclose a sketch of these, which has been published.

General Pichegru has crossed the Rhine, and with a considerable force; but probably, at present, for the purpose only of quartering his army in the enemy's country. He is now in the neighborhood of Mayence, which is still beset by troops of France, as fairly if not more so, than any other place, against whom in the empire the forces of the republic will be directed; for the door which was opened to receive propositions from the princes of the Germanic body, through the King of Prussia, was not an idle provision. Advantage, I am told, has already been taken of it; and that it will most probably prove the means, and to the credit and interest of the United States, to unite and to take the view of the powers of Europe.

The negotiation with Spain is still at a stand. The Spanish court is strongly inclined to connect itself with this republic, but, in so doing, it foresees the necessity of an accommodation with us in respect to the boundaries and the Mission of the late King. If Spain is determined to effect that, it is better that we should still continue to have an eye on that effect. Of the views of England, however, Spain is, and always was, jealous; so that it is not improbable an accommodation may soon take place. It is said that the King of Spain makes a provision for the children of the late King, the object of his care; that he wishes to have them delivered up to him, with the view of giving them an establishment in property somewhere in his dominions, with the title of duke to the boy; and that this point, in some form or other, will probably be agreed.

At sea, in the excursions which were made in the course of the winter, by tempest, great loss was sustained; and considering that the war will hereafter be directed principally against England, less attention was for some time paid to the navy than ought to have been expected. At present, however, the attention of the executive branch seems to be turned more towards that object than heretofore; so that it is probable the waste of the winter will be soon repaired.

The attempts continue to depreciate, and the frequent discussions which take place upon the various propositions made to raise their credit, always produce the opposite effect, of depressing them. Many think, however, the depreciation a blessing to the country, and that their total fall would be among the happiest of political events, especially if they can be kept up through the summer. At present, their depreciation is by the standard of gold, or foreign exchange, as fourteen to one.

The mass of wealth in national domains is affirmed, by those who ought to know, more than double what I supposed; being, after restoring the property of those who were illegally condemned, according to a late decree, about four hundred millions sterling. A deputation has lately sent to Holland of Bierges and Rhenbuhl, to press for money; and it is expected they will succeed, at least in such degree as to answer present exigencies.

I am happy to hear that the President approves my conduct in the instance mentioned; and I beg you to assure him, that for the future, I shall continue to be neither less attentive nor assiduous in the discharge of the duties of the trust committed to my charge, and which I have been hitherto faithfully entered the Convention, and which I have done before been.

P. S. Since writing the above, I was informed personally by one of the agents who attended Mr. Eden at Dieppe, that he (Mr. Eden) had power to treat on other subjects than that of an exchange of prisoners, and that he not only communicated this, but also his propositions, and which of them he was willing to have given Mr. Eden, was peculiarly acceptable, and with which he himself could be perfectly satisfied. What the propositions were, I know not; but that they contemplated peace cannot be doubted.

From the Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

June 1st, 1795.

Sir:
The uneasiness which has been discovered by the French republic, in reference to our late treaty with Great Britain, is such as to require the more serious attention of the President, to maintain an honorable interchange of friendship between the United States and France, have determined me to review our conduct from the commencement of the present war. In it shall unreservedly expose the policy of the Executive, as it may be collected from the documents of this Department that the imputation of an alienation in property somewhere in his dominions, with the title of duke to the boy; and that this point, in some form or other, will probably be agreed.

At sea, in the excursions which were made in the course of the winter, by tempest, great loss was sustained; and considering that the war will hereafter be directed principally against England, less attention was for some time paid to the navy than ought to have been expected. At present, however, the attention of the executive branch seems to be turned more towards that object than heretofore; so that it is probable the waste of the winter will be soon repaired.

The attempts continue to depreciate, and the frequent discussions which take place upon the various propositions made to raise their credit, always produce the opposite effect, of depressing them. Many think, however, the depreciation a blessing to the country, and that their total fall would be among the happiest of political events, especially if they can be kept up through the summer. At present, their depreciation is by the standard of gold, or foreign exchange, as fourteen to one.

Sin:

P. S. Since writing the above, I was informed personally by one of the agents who attended Mr. Eden at Dieppe, that he (Mr. Eden) had power to treat on other subjects than that of an exchange of prisoners, and that he not only communicated this, but also his propositions, and which of them he was willing to have given Mr. Eden, was peculiarly acceptable, and with which he himself could be perfectly satisfied. What the propositions were, I know not; but that they contemplated peace cannot be doubted.
Immediately upon this event "only one opinion prevailed as to the badness of the constitution." No plan of a new constitution was even reported for a considerable time afterwards; none was adopted for many months. At this instant the proposed permanent system is locked up from operation; but what the permanent system will really be, no one can tell. The Convention were privately calling for guards to protect themselves from the people. The very ministers declared that the National Assembly could be brought into no kind of consistency. A national bankruptcy, and a difficulty of supplies, were too much to be apprehended. Strong symptoms of anomaly; the shedding of blood; and information that the question between absolute monarchy and a republic must be decided by forces; were prophetic of some great catastrophe.

Examine next the external relations of France. The foreign ministers, except the minister of the United States, had fled. The alliances against her were multiplying; the enemy numerous; their object to erect a military government. But the British cabinet had been deceived; France was not intimidated; the French army was sustained; and the affections of the French people not decisively directed to any specific object. If the United States had panted for war as much as ancient Rome; if their armies had been as effective as those of Prussia; if their coffers had been full, and their debts annihilated, even then, the war was too premature to affect for the most flattering issue of war.

A professional motive dissuaded us from war, so were we without an obligation to enter into it as a party. No cause juidexis had arisen upon our alliance with France. We had not, nor have we yet, been required to execute the guarantee; and, therefore, it was unnecessary to speak concerning it.

Had we indulged our sensibility for the crisis hanging over France, and associated our injuries with hers, the rashness of the step would have been proverbial. An infant country, deep in debts necessitated to borrow in Europe; without manufactures; without a land or naval force; without a competency of arms or ammunition; with a commerce closely connected beyond the Atlantic, with a certainty of enhancing the price of foreign productions, and diminishing that of our own; with a constitution little more than four years old; in a state of prostration, and not exempt from foes; such a country can have no greater curse in store for her than war. That peace was our policy has been admitted by Congress, by the People, and by France herself. France could not have thought otherwise: for, had we been active, she would have been deprived of our provisions except by snatches, and our payments to her must have been suspended.

The proclamation of neutrality, therefore, which was our first important act, after the eruption of the war, deserved to be the model of our subsequent conduct.

At the request of the President, Mr. Jefferson, if departed not from the line prescribed by the proclamation, was no small indication of his being resolved to cultivate a friendship with the new republic. Mr. Genet came over as minister, upon the death of Louis XVI. He was the protege of a party whose downfall had been predicted from Paris in 1789; and it was not improbable that some of the neutral Powers would endeavor to incalculate an open support from France. Mr. Jefferson, Chief Magistrate, who had been the organ of the general will when they were formed. But what said the President? Did he waiver in recognising them as compacts with the French Nation? Did he affect delays? Was he eager to seize a pretext from the disenchaining of Mr. Genet near the Southern extremity of our continent to force the distribution of his commissions, as he travelled and his country required? If French consuls in arrogating a judicial authority over prizes in the United States? No sir; Mr. Genet was received without a previous inquiry; without a qualification or condition; immediately; and with an indifference to the murmurs of the belligerent Powers. For our minister had been before instructed that "it appeared to him to be absolutely necessary to acknowledge any government to be rightful, which is formed by the will of the nation, substantially declared."

A few days brought forth a third decree of the National Convention, of February 19th, 1793, authorizing the French Executive to propose a treaty with the United States, on the principles of equal and indefeasible rights of belligerents; which unite the two nations; and informed us, in a letter of May 334, 1793, that he was authorized to treat accordingly.

I really doubt whether, upon this head, the French republic, if left to herself, would utter one remack. But party, which, if it be not abolished, must be the bane of the Union, fights under the popular banners of France, and endeavors to overthrow its adversary by propagating a belief that she has been ill treated. These calumnies cannot be more effectuallyCheck than by examining the commercial relations already subsisting by treaty between the United States and France.

Firstly, the invasion of the two countries was placed, among other things, upon the following grounds:

1st. Both parties "engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional."

2d. The French were to pay, in our ports, &c. no other or greater duties or imposts on those which the nations most friendly were liable to pay, and who shall carry their goods with us, as if they had been received by us as if they had been received by us as if we had been the same nation, or as if carried on by them.

3d. The Americans were to enjoy the same privileges in the French ports in Europe. In this included an exemption of one hundred sols per ton, established in France on foreign ships, unless their ships shall load with the merchandise of France for another port in the same dominion: they are then to pay the duty above mentioned so long as other nation, the most favored, shall be obliged to pay it; the United States being at liberty to establish an equivalent duty in the same case.

4th. Free ships were to give freedom to goods.

5th. American or French property on board of enemy ships was confiscable.

6th. Regulations were made for contraband, and the carrying on of war by either against its enemies, so as to prevent it to the other.

7th. The Americans were to have one or more free ports granted to them in Europe, for bringing and disposing of their merchandise; and the free ports, which had been, at the date of the treaty, (May 6th, 1787) and were then, open to the United States, were continued to the Americans.

Mr. Jefferson, in his report to Congress, on the state of our commerce and navigation, sums up the important restrictions proceeding from France, to be:

1st. That, as far as the summer of 1792, our rice was heavily duties in France.

2d. That our fish and salted provisions were under prohibitory duties in France.

3d. That our vessels were denied naturalization in France.

4th. That our salted pork and bread stuff (except maize) were received under temporary duties only in the French West Indies, and our salt fish paid them a weighty duty: And

5th. That our own carriage of our own tobacco was heavily duties in France.

The subjoined extracts from letters of this Department to our minister in Paris, on the 23rd of January, 10th of March, 28th of April, 16th of June, 1793, and on the 12th of March, 1793, bespeak our earnestness for an extension of our commercial transactions with France.

EXTRACTS.

January 23.—"I feel myself particularly bound to recommend, as the most important of your charges, the patronage of our commerce and the extension of its privileges, both in France and her colonies; but more especially the latter." Mr. Madison, March 10.—"We had expected, ere this, that, in consequence of the recommendation of their predecessors, some overtures would have been made to us on the subject of a treaty of commerce; an authentic copy of the recommen-tion was delivered, but nothing said about carrying it into effect. Perhaps they expect that we should declare our readiness to meet them on the ground of treaty; if they do, we have no hesitation to declare it. In the mean time, if the present communications produce but a sensation, they may furnish a good occasion to endeavor to have matters replaced in state quo, by repealing the late innovations as to our ships, tobacco, and whale oil. It is right that those who have the means of should foot it first on this point."

April 28—"I hope that these manifestations of friendly dispositions towards that country will induce them to renew the very ominous laws respecting our commerce, which were passed by the preceding National Assembly. The present session of Congress has purported to repeal them. I feel that any other dispositions of a friendly preference between the two countries would have induced me to accede to the re-establishment of our commerce with France, on the footing on which it was at the beginning of their Revolution. That treaty may be long on the anvil; in the mean time, we cannot submit to the late innovations without taking measures to do justice to our own navigation. This object, therefore, is particularly dear to me. You will not be at liberty to present any opportunity of arranging our commerce in any other part. I am in hopes you will have found the means of favoring my arrival in France, when Mr. Claviere was in the ministry, and the dispositions of the National Assembly favorable to the ministers."

June 16—"Mutual good offices, mutual affection, and similar principles of Government, seem to designate the two nations for the most intimate connections; and I cannot too much press it on you to improve every opportunity which may occur in the changeable scenes which are passing, and to seize them as they occur, for placing our commerce with that nation and its dependencies on the freest and most encouraging footing possible.

What were the corresponding efforts of my minister relative to a treaty of commerce? In June, 1793, he was instructed by Dungore, then at Rome, to defer it until he should return from the 4th, when he was informed that the treaty was then at the same stage in the Senate, and that he was against all treaties other than the one with America. In July, 1793, our minister had "repeatedly called the minister's attention to the obnoxious acts of the [then] late Assembly, and to their proposition of a new commercial treaty. The reply was, that, for himself, he would be glad to settle the commerce between the two countries. The minister expressed his opinion that the object, which was then his, was more feasible now than at any other time; he would not therefore think of proposing a treaty, but of arranging our commerce in the meanwhile; but the attention of Government was turned too strongly towards itself in the present moment to think of its exterior interests; and that the Assembly, at open war with the Executive, would certainly reject whatever should be now presented to them." The following extracts of our minister's letter to Mr. Chambois, on the 9th of July, 1793, and of his answer on the 23d of the same month, show the measures of our Government for the improvement of the treaty.

"I should, however, fail in my duty towards my nation, sir, and I should offer but a feeble testimony of the attachment which I have for so many years vowed to yours, if I were to dissimulate the discontent, which the decrees of the constituent assembly, infringing the system of commerce established between France and the United States, before the year 1789, have excited in America. I forego all remarks on that subject, because I leave it to your wisdom and the sentiments of your nation; and I dare believe, that, even if it concerned merely its own interests, the National Assembly would no longer suffer regulations to exist which fall still harder upon the French consumers than the English; for my part, sir, I am quite satisfied, that your Government will not be made them, and that they wish to establish that treaty on bases, just, solid, and reciprocally useful to both nations. The minister plenipotentiary of France at Philadelphia has the best opportunity of weighing its advantages, and I am of opinion, that, if he is charged by the King with that negotiation, he will meet, on our part, the most friendly dispositions. You will give me very great pleasure, sir, when you shall please to authorize me to write that he is entrusted with that business."

July 23d, 1793—"I shall likewise lay before him the desire which the American Government expresses to cement the union of the two people, by a new treaty of commerce, and I shall immediately take the orders of the King for commencing that important negotiation. I do not doubt but it will soon be brought to a happy conclusion, since the two Governments are equally desirous of establishing the new treaty on the basis of the strictest justice, and, consequently, of the most reciprocal advantage of both people."

On the 13th of February, 1793, we were informed by our minister, that, having been instructed to transfer the negotiation of a new treaty of commerce to America, the thing wished was done; and that we may treat in America."

Mr. Genet's above-mentioned letter of the 23d of May, 1793, enclosing the decree of February 19th, 1793, concluded in these words: "The obstacles raised with intentions hostile to liberty, by the preposterous ministers of despotism, the obstacles, whose object was to stop the rapid progress of the commerce of the Americans, and the extension of that commerce in the two worlds; the obstacles which were thrown in their way by a rising of the States during the five months just elapsed, and which are now enclosed, all her ports in the two worlds; has granted them all the favors which her own citizens enjoy in her vast possessions; has invited them to participate the benefits of her navigation, in granting to their vessels the freedom of the American ports; thus, to your Government, has established a treaty of commerce, which is, in a national compact, the liberal and fraternal basis on which she wishes to see raised the commercial and political system of Two People, all whose interests are confounded.

I am invested, sir, with the powers necessary to undertake this important negotiation, of which the sad annals of human suffering and of commerce, with opening opening of expectations, is the only commentary."

I find no answer to this letter from Mr. Jefferson; and he notices the steps which were taken in consequence of it only in his letter to Mr. Morris, on the 23d of August, 1793, thus: "The Senate being then (23d May, 1793) in recess, and not to meet again till July, I doubt not but that your attention to the ratification of treaty, given by the King and Senate, will be attended with success; for the execution of their own orders, which had been left to be done in my hands, is impossible without it."
Upon this conduct of Mr. Jefferson, inviolate comments have been circulated; and it has been prevented into a testimony of our evasion, and of our disaffections to France, with a design to foment dissensions between the two republics. Your exertions will doubtless frustrate the evil purpose.

Looking back from a distance, the idea of commerce, suffering, in the mean time, severities, from her commercial regulations. Can any rational man believe, when he reads the preceding confidential letters from the Department of State to our minister in Paris, that they were fabricated to deceive? Deception must have been the object of the author of this despatch. He might have been induced to believe, before to this judgment on our part, in the profession of a desire to improve the treaty, what culpable cause can be assigned for repelling the immediate negotiation? Were we looking for an adverse stroke to the affairs of France, in order to squeeze out greater commercial indulgences? We have been charged by Great Britain with too lively a sympathy with her successes, because we have not only lent our commerce to her in the course of her engagements, but have expressed opinions upon this occasion. But the President came to an instantaneous decision, by receiving Mr. Genet in the face of the war with Great Britain; recognizing the treaties, continuing to pay our debt to France; accommodating her with money by anticipation. Had the cause of republicanism any connexion with a change in the treaty of commerce? The principal object of its commerce, if its commerce was to be pursued, must have been to insinuate a leaning towards England, is no less base, than unfounded in his calumnies. In short, it is absolutely inconsiderable why the Executive should, from a policy which it will not avow, put off a treaty, for the reforming of it. It is probable, when the situation of the country was so closely allied with the expectations, of profit to the husbandman and merchant, created by our neutrality.

There was no such evasion; and the agreement or understanding between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Genet cannot be wrought into such a shape. Being without documents, containing the whole of their conversation, I have no other clue to it than the letter of August 29th, 1793, the nature of the subject, and the circumstances of the period, as explanatory of the posthumous of the negotiation.

It is of no consequence to inquire, whether it was or was not more agreeable to Mr. Genet that the negotiation should be over, when he heard that a definite answer must be delayed until the meeting of the Senate. Notwithstanding it has the appearance of being the voluntary act of both; especially as Mr. Genet suffered it to rest upon an oral despatch, and never had, nor asked, a written answer; yet let it be conceded to have been, on the part of Mr. Jefferson, an act of the Government, and on the part of Mr. Genet, a respectful submission.

Looking back from a distance, the ideas entertained in the preliminaries to the Paris Convention, and the advice and consent of the Senate. A definite answer was, therefore, necessarily, deferred. He did not allege that intermediate discussions could not take place; nor indeed does it appear that either of those gentlemen turned their attention to the preliminary negotiation; which might have been opened before the assembling of the Senate.

There were no intermediate discussions presented, as a ground of not negotiating with France, or alienation from France, stood in the way. 1. "On the declaration of war between France and England, the United States being at peace with both, their situation was so new and unexperienced by themselves, that it was extremely desirable to exclude any business which would absorb much time, and might be postponed; in order that the Executive might be unencumbered in a superhuman possession of our neutral rights. The commencement of the war, the early part of September, 1793, have been seen by the world, yet cannot they judge of the perplexities and researches which were the foundation of the documents published, and which hourly occasioned new difficulties to the Executive, and, however, but those difficulties, and the want of all proofs which can show to us, that, as a neutral nation, encompassed by the ministers of the belligerent Powers, inflamed with a jealousy of the public functionaries, a day would pass without a complaint, a demand, a suspicion, and a thousand temptations to irritability. Fries of papers, verifying those predictions, are now before my eyes. 2. It was not to be supposed that the conference or negotiation to which the Senate would be invited, would be so beneficial. 3. The power of the President to authorize the Secretary of State, or indeed any other person, to digest the matter of a treaty, has been recognized in practice in several forms; one of which is barely to nominate, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and occasionally to consult them. The last was the only form in which the President of the United States, during the terms of Mr. G. of the Senate, 1790. The Senate being on the spot, and, therefore, convenient to the negotiation, were asked, as the subject was passing, whether they would ratify certain clauses, if inserted in the treaty. In the re-adjustment of the treaty of commerce with France, it was probably wished to repeat the same measure.

What would have been gained by France, by precipitating the negotiation? The preliminary discussions might, perhaps, have closed a few months sooner on the side of the President; but it is entirely uncertain whether the affair would have been expedited by any step, so much as by consulting the Senate upon points of particular magnitude, and of very weight, the appropriate authority was unable to them, and the negotiation was accomplished in the United States, and is unattainable in a negotiation elsewhere. However, if a commencement had been made, I question whether, from the time which is indispensable for so grand a transaction, and the unavoidable interruption incident to the new state of things, we should not have been obliged, in my opinion, upon a point of such a high importance, to the French ministry, that we were too much employed in steering clear of the war, to attend for the present to the remodelling of the treaty.

Had the Executive been disposed to the treaty, why did he in a manner pledge himself to negotiate when the Senate had just determined to establish it in the Congress at the seat of Government? This conduct of a delay in the Executive of France this delay, which has prevented, as yet, our formal accession to their proposition to treat with them, that the President will meet them, with the most friendly dispositions, on the grounds of treaty proposed by the National Convention, as soon as he can do it in the forms of the constitution; and of course to suggest, for this purpose, that the powers of Mr. Genet renewed to his successor. A formal accession to the proposition to treat, and a negotiation in the forms of the constitution, appear to be still preferred to informal discussions, for the reasons already assigned. It is impossible to look into this subject, without remarking that other principles may be consulted, upon which the Executive might have referred to treat immediately but which do not appear to have influenced his decision. His attention must have been arrested by the diction of Mr. Genet's overtures. The President and the French republic had hitherto agitated a change in commercial regulations only when Mr. Genet announces a desire to modify the political connexion also. The precise meaning of the term political was, that the Executive was bound to the treaty of alliance, established by the treaty of commerce, as proposed to be revised.

The movements which have been noticed, of Mr. Genet, before his arrival at Philadelphia from Charleston, were in perfect union with this interpretation. The very decree of the 19th of February, 1792, liberalizing the laws of France, or annexing the concessions; for the French colonies could not be fed without supplies from the United States; and the suspension of the law of May 15th, 1791, which had induced the Americans from introducing, selling, and arming vessels in France, and from enjoying all the privileges allowed to those built in the ship yards of the republic, was calculated to confide and French moderates.

To confirm the real views of the Executive Council of France in the regeneration of the treaty, recollect these passages in Mr. Genet's instructions:

That the executive council are disposed to set on foot a negotiation upon those foundations, and that they do not know the proposition that admits of a treaty still more extensive, in becoming a national agreement, in which two great peoples shall suspend their commercial and political interests, and establish a mutual understanding, to defend the empire of liberty, wherever it can be embraced; to guaranty the sovereignty of the people, and punish those Powsers who shall approach too near the borders of it. They therefore, propose to extend their commerce to all the ports of contracting parties. Such a pact, which the people of France will support with all the energy which distinguishes them, and of which they have already given so many proofs, will quickly contribute to the general emanation of the new world. However vast this project may be, it will not be difficult to execute, if the American states determine on it; and it is to convince them of its practicability that Genet must direct all his attention for, besides the advantages which humanity in general will draw from the success of such a negotiation, we have at this moment a particular interest to be gained; and this is a subject on which we should be as effectually and as actively engaged. The Powers attack us from hatred to our principles; if the English ministers, instead of sharing in the glory of France, instead of considering that our liberty, as well as that of those people whose chains we have broken, forever establishes that of their own country, suffer themselves to be influenced by our enemies, and by those to the little group, and to the tempestuous and destructive passions making in Great Britain every day more and more serious, and have an intimate connexion with those of Spain. The friendship which reigns between the ministers of the last Power and those of St. James proves it and in this situation of affairs we ought to excite, by all possible means, the zeal of Americans, who are as much interested in the interests of the United States as in those of England or Spain, because these powers are our natural enemies. Their own safety still depends on ours, and, if we fail, they will sooner or later fall under the iron rod of Great Britain. The executive council has room to believe, that these reasons, in addition to the great commercial advantages which we are disposed to concede to the United States, will determine their Government to adopt the measure. In all that citizen Genet shall propose to them on our part. As it is possible, however, that the false representations which have been made to Congress of the situation of our internal affairs; of the state of our maritime force; of our finances; and especially of the storms with which we are threatened; may make her ministers, in the negotiations which they are engaged in, too scrupulous and too scrupulous, the Government, in order to bind them, in expectation that the American Government will finally determine to make a common cause with us, to take such steps as will appear to him exigencies may require, to serve the cause of liberty and the freedom of the people.

The project, therefore, of a treaty, on the basis of Mr. Genet's propositions, ought to have been well explored before the first advance. To assent to them, if it would not have been a departure from neutrality, would at least have magnified the suspicion of our faith, without a confidence in which that neutrality must always be insecure. To reject them was to incur discontent, possibly a breach with our ally. The councils of nations ought to be superior to the passions which drive individuals. Permanency good being the polar star of the former, they will often have to encounter the impetuosity of the latter, who substitute occasional feelings for sound policy.

Admitting that the non-establishment of a constitution, and the rapid successions in the administrative bodies, could not weaken an agreement once fixed, even under the pressure of war, there was no probability that the party, which, unhappily, had divided the measures of the Government, would equally please those who should rise upon the ruins of his friends. We knew from letters, that, as far back as Aug., 1792, the movers of the Revolution on the 10th of that month were, sooner or later, destined to be victims; that France was on the verge of a great war, that the revolution was in full career, and that the Constitution was being destroyed. The latter, as the destruction of the Girondine and that the revolutionary tribunal, vast and unbounded in its domination, had been erected. Was this, then, a season for "modifying the political connexion," when we might have drawn hostility upon our heads, by betraying a spirit not impartial, and by taking measures which, amid the fluctuations in the heads of the French politics, might not have been sanctioned? And what did actually lay against us? The conduct of the Robespermist faction was directly the reverse of the Brissotine; the one encouraged, the other abolished, private trade. For the evidence of this fact, I refer you to your own knowledge; to the vexations of our commerce; to the decrees which violated our treaty; and to the decree of October, 1792, which took all trade into the hands of Government. Nor can I omit the demonstration of a general instability, as it was delivered in a late report of the five committees:

"We are persuaded, and let us proclaim it openly—it is to that perpetual change that all our evils are owing. Our Republican annals do not yet include three years, and by the multiplicity of events, twenty centuries appear comparatively standing still in comparison with our revolutions. Individual revolutions are succeeded in the same manner as every thing changes yet; and, in this continual eb and flow of opposite movements, in vain would the Government pretend to that confidence which can only be the result of a steady and wise conduct, and of a constant attachment to principles.

"Commerce necessarily disappeared through this astonishing succession of contrarieties, and in a country where individuals, incapacitated for making any sure calculations, see around them nothing but a wide prospect of changes.

"Credit is a tender plant, which needs gentle and regular winds, and cannot grow in a tempestuous clime, or soil often disturbed.

"If we would put a period to the reign of uncertainties, and fix invariably the principles of justice, equity, and loyalty, which should be the guides of our conduct. Let us hasten to subject the internal administration to a regular system. Let us especially take care that no measure ever gives rise to tears concerning the solidity of the monarchical system.

"When the Government, steady in its march, shall have shown the real end they aim at; it shall have rendered an account to itself and to others, of the system it intends to adopt; when the Convention, dismissing those unfortunate bucklers which have too often impeded their progress, shall attend solely to the happiness of the people; when they shall have taken care to repress with indignation all measures which are infringing, in the least degree, the principles of justice and good faith which should direct them; then all alarms will be at an end, and the restoration of the finances, of credit, and of commerce, may be undertaken with assurance of success."

"The subject was not resumed with Mr. Genet is well known to every body who has heard of his excesses, and our declaration to the French republic, that we should expect his successor to be charged with similar powers. His letter of the 30th of September, 1793, written after the application for his recall was announced to him, was prevented, by the malady of Philadelphia, from being received by this Department, until the 4th of November, 1793. We were then counting upon a return of the vessel sent to France on that errand. Congress met in December, 1793. Our minister's letter, notifying his recall, came to hand January 14th, 1794; and Mr. Fauchet actually replaced him on the 21st of February, 1794. Let me observe, however, in passing from Mr. Genet to Mr. Fauchet, that we have a right to expect the privileges in the decree of March 30th, 1793, and the decree itself, are strong symp\noms of the infirmities of the negotiation being more than one merely commercial. For the different alterations between a treaty and a commercial convention: Mr. Jefferson's correspondence.

"Mr. Fauchet demanded the arrest of Mr. Genet, for punishment. Our co-operation was refused, upon reasons of law and magistracy."

"Next, at his instance, for relief of the vessels which had taken refuge in the ports of the United States. We have advanced money faster than was due; and full as fast as prudence, in respect to our own wants, would permit."

"The subject of the Camilla, a provision vessel of the French republic, was the effect of the embargo, which operated equally on all."

"Our minister was recalled, as he desired. Mr. Fauchet complained of British vessels being suffered to depart during the embargo, with Frenchmen who meant to act against our country in the West Indies. Occasional relaxations were made in favor of all nations. The British, for instance, were permitted to export the produce of the island. In the particular case complained of, the passports were supposed to be granted to American bottoms, for the humane purpose of returning to the islands some of the unhappy French fugitives from hence; and one of them, given to a vessel at his instance," exported a large quantity of powder, doubtless without his privity."

"The answer was given, that the cargo of the vessel under the command of Jean Juteau, of Boston, as Mr. Fauchet desired. Whatever irritation may have been occasioned by the attorney of the district, was owing to no instruction from the President."

"The demand for dismantling Cooper's vessel was inevitable, as she had been fitted out in our ports; and wherever, in any case, restitution of vessels was required from us, the rules of our neutrality fully justified it."

"We restored the ship William, of Glasgow; and the damages during her detention have been assured to the agent of the captors."
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

[1797.]

The steps adopted, and promised, for executing the consular convention, in the apprehension of deserters, are as much as could be done or expected.

The Government has, indeed, under Mr. Fauchet, in the construction of the treaty not holding themselves bound to exclude British ships of war, except when they came in with prizes.

The 4th of April, 1794, was conveyed to Congress Mr. Pinckney's letter, enclosing the instructions of the 6th of November, 1793.

In addition to this, the executive and judicial state of things between us and Great Britain, it had been collected and resolute. From the paper respecting spoliation, that "the British privateers plundered the American vessels threw out of their course by forcing them, upon groundless suspicion, into ports other than those to which they were destined; detained them even after the hope of a regular confiscation was abandoned; by their negligence in destroying them except in case of capture, and the vessels to destruction, and maltreated the crews." That our occasional trade to the British West Indies was burdened unnecessarily; that our vessels were captured in going to the French West Indies; and that the proceedings in the British vice admiralties were rigorous, transgressed judicial purity, and heaped the most intolerable and fruitless expenses upon our commerce. All these were understood, as proportioned their injury.

It makes no part of my object to compare the various schemes which were circulating to face those public distresses; nor to prove the superiority of the policy adopted by the Executive, to commercial reprisals, sequestration, and the stoppage of intercourse. It is enough to say, that his policy is affirmed to be, to proclaim a war of commerce to the whole world, and shew, which had to often been the case, that the advanced prosperity of the United States, should be contemplated.

By what means did the President expect to execute the work of peace through the agency of Mr. Jay? By announcing to the world our solicitude for a friendly adjustment of our complaints, and a reluctance to hostility. By sending a man who, going directly from the United States, would carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country; and would be taught to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity. The Senate, therefore, did probably anticipate what might be the objects of his mission when they confirmed the nomination. For the President details no powers, and founds his nomination upon the information possessed by themselves.

It has been, or may be, objected, 1. That the Senate did not contemplate the making of any treaty whatsoever. This was not the case. The Constitution is silent upon that point. Congress is the authority under which the President is to act, and the Senate is the department that is to advise and consent to treaties. That treaty had not been vested in Mr. Jay powers as extensive as a treaty of commerce; and, 4. That the treaty with Great Britain is justly offensive to France.

2. But the President had no more authority to make a treaty of commerce than in a treaty of war; for the several departments of power in the Senate, when the nomination was assented to. Scarcely one of them could, in the ordinary course of proceeding, be accommodated without an agreement. Some expressly struck at the inexecutiveness of the past treaty. Upon others, no treaty had ever existed, though overtures for that purpose had been repeated by the United States. That a treaty would spring from such a position; and it was equally necessary to the United States, to avoid the war at all events, to make an agreement with Great Britain.

And why should not a treaty be concluded with Great Britain? Was it because she had despised us? The objection would lie with equal strength against even a treaty of peace. It would forbid a treaty of peace even with Great Britain. It is well known that the ministers of that country were not in the same degree attentive; or even intimate, with our own. If we were to carry this to its utmost extent, it might be an argument against the conclusion of any treaty, by the power of the United States, with any nation, or any of them.

2. A treaty of commerce with Great Britain has for many years been anxiously pushed by the United States. We have a just right to assert our commercial rights against Great Britain. Witness the measures of the French government against her unoffending commercial property; and they would have been still more offensive against our coast, if we had declined it. Witness the arguments drawn from thence for a more energetic Government, which should inspire a dread of reprisal. Witness the bill which passed the House of Representatives at an early session, discriminating between nations having no commercial treaty with us, and those which had. What was the Secretary of State, but a plan forforcing the British Government into a treaty of commerce? Has he not clearly unfolded this sentiment? What were the commercial propositions but emanations from the same system? The want of a commercial treaty was the single circumstance which propituated the severity of the proposed distinction of Great Britain and France.

Exclusively of these various acts, the facilities to our commerce, both European and West Indian, which would flow from such a treaty, rendered it very desirable.

Perhaps, for a treaty of commerce alone, an envoy would not have been thought of. But surely, to include in one, the removal of other vexations that are in an important point, commercial interests, was the saving of one negotiation at least. Some of our vexations on the water were owing to the non-compliance of the customary appendages to a commercial treaty. But that might be compensated without a treaty; but a treaty was the best assurance of the future. In a word, the Senate must have been sensible of many particulars being comprehended by the general outlines of the nominate treaties.

When the President nominates ministers, he may, if he pleases, restrict himself to the name, the grade, and the Prince or State. He might, for example, have nominated Mr. Jay thus: "I nominate John Jay, as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States to France." If he had taken the liberty of saying that, the President would have been at liberty to employ him in any negotiation with that King. Their power being ample on the completion of the treaty, they are not a necessary constitutional party in the concoction of it, unless the President should find it expedient to request their immediate advice. It would be superfluous to discuss how far he might have limited himself by the terms of the nomination, as I again contend, and how I have shown, that he did not limit himself.

3. We cannot foresee the representations which Mr. Fauchet is to understand to be meditating to the French republic, and the reason he was sent, he was to prevent the treaty itself from being concluded without our consent, and in a manner of which we disapprobation. Whereas the treaty is not to be brought to Great Britain, than our treaties with France were forbidden by the instructions of the envoy to be infringed, so did the President approve, that the restriction should be communicated to him. This was conformable with the truth, and wears no deceptive countenance.

The British government inclining with respect to Mr. Jay's mission to London, you may say, that he is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and France. It is not improbable that you will be obliged to encounter on this head, suspicions of various kinds. But you may declare the motives of that mission to be, to obtain immediate compensation for our plundered property, and restitution of the posts. You may intimate, by way of argument, but without ascribing it to the Government, that if war should be necessary, the afferences of the people of the United States towards it would be better secured by a manifestation that every step had been taken to avoid it; and that the British nation would be divided, when they found that we had been as careful in our own defence as in that of the British nation. It might be repeated, that we had given no encouragement to the French nation to make war, by submitting to the pleasure or animadversions of France any part of his instructions with which France had no concern. A contrary conduct would have been irreconcileable, also, with the independence of the United States, and would have put them into leading strings. It would have been little short of trepidation under a master.

A treaty of commerce was altogether eventual; it was to be kept out of sight, until the posts and depredations should be so adjusted as to promise a continuance of tranquillity. 2. It was eventual in another sense; being to be concluded or not, according to the degrees of advantage. 3. It was deemed important that Mr. Jay should communicate no commercial powers to our British ministry. 4. Every commercial privilege which Great Britain should acquire, would devolve on France on like conditions. What would France say, if we were to insist that every embassy of her commercial treaties, every possibility of new commercial arrangements, should be laid before our Government? Certainly this: that no fellowship between the two countries authorizes an expectation that the United States should throw itself upon the defense of the other to war or not its negotiations; and that national honor is an ample guardian of our treaties.

Among the numberless disgusts which nations have entertained against each other, I do not remember that a treaty of commerce was ever concluded between two of such nations, respecting the rights of neutral foreigners. Let me cite only two: When Portugal, early in this century, surrendered many of her commercial advantages to Great Britain; and France, not ten years ago, contracted a disadvantageous treaty with the same Power; who manifested but their own subjects and people? If we are told that we ought not to draw our connexion closer with Great Britain, and that France will be jealous, the answer is, that if we can multiply the markets for our great staples; if we can purchase our foreign goods cheaper, by having many manufacturing nations to resort to; or if, even, in the maintenance of neutral privileges, wellcan, by stipulation, not derogatory from the rights of others, avertas; an country is an advantage as well as security by any reasonable opposition. The romantic extent to which commercial power should be carried, would abolish every advantage of every national and individual; no nation or tiercets appeared false government, false religion, false morals, false policy, or any other political defect.

Your instructions justify you in advising, that Mr. Jay "is positively forbidden to weaken the engagements between this country and Great Britain," the latitude of which, in this case, the President left to your discretion, in his direct exception, and immutable: "That as the British ministry will doubtless be solicitous to detach us from France, and probably make some overture of this kind, you will inform them, that the Government of the United States will not derogate from our treaties and engagements with France."

When the President left to you a discretion respecting the objection of Great Britain, to an exclusion from Mr. Jay's mission of every object, except compensation for plundered property, and restitution of the posts. For a moment, let me entreat you to call to mind the different topics for negotiation, which were actually before the Senate at the time of Mr. Jay's nomination, and which were not included in either of those points. Were not Mr. Jefferson's, animadversions upon the refusal of Great Britain to enter into a commercial treaty, and his plan for commercial reforms, before you?
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Would it not have been extraordinary to pass by so fair an opportunity of bringing forward all our discontent? Was it not urged as an objection to the measure, that the terms of the nomination were sufficiently broad for any purpose of negotiation? But appeal is made to the facts: had the minister gone away, it is probable that our minister in London would have been directed to pursue his efforts in the ordinary track as to everything else. This was the true idea, when your instructions were prepared: we were desirous of repelling any imputation of the most distant intention to sacrifice our cause or our country. It would have been injurious to the counsels of the National Convention, which were of a nature warranting the assertion, that we would not sacrifice the one connection for the other.

Mr. Jay was instructed to this effect: "One of the causes of your mission are the vexations and spoliations committed on our commerce by the authority of instructions from the British Government. A second cause of your mission is the injury inflicted, by the principle of neutrality, to the commercial interests of France. Within a short period of time, the difference between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the treaty of peace. It is referred to your discretion, whether, in case the two preceding points should be so accommodated, as to promise the continuance of tranquility between the United States and Great Britain, the commercial interests may not be listened to be by, or even broken yet the British ministry. If it should, let these be the general objects."

Your instructions, therefore, were commensurate with fact and propriety.

1st. They were literally true, because the motives were the vexations of our commerce and the pests.

2d. They were by words: "for two cardinal reasons, not a single direct or eventual.

3d. The confidential proceedings of the United States are not demandable by another nation, except where that nation is injured by them.

4th. Otherwise, every modification of a direct and pernicious challenge of our rights; every compensation, but the deplorable expense of the wrong which was not instantaneous and unequally, ought to be avoided by Mr. Jay; because they were not stated in your instructions as motives to his mission. But,

5th. To scout the suspicion of a deception on the French republic, what manner could have been more paltry, than one which a few months must certainly exhibit in a day? What emotions could the French republic have, if Mr. Jay's instructions had been inspected by them? Would they have hazarded a hint, that we must have been surprised by the French republic, in having repelled by arms the meddling of other nations in their internal affairs? We should have quoted our own independence, which would tolerate the control of such a ministry? The British ministry was in France to be necessarily a contravention of our treaties with France. We should have searched in vain for any such provision in those treaties. Would they have argued that a treaty of commerce with Great Britain contributed to up their national event? Not a syllable in the instructions could be read as a treatise or Ordinances of Good Behaviour. It remains to be seen, whether the contents of this treaty are inconsistent with our other treaties; whether the French republic have asked us to interdict our trade with Great Britain? They could not have been gratified. Rather our instructions were intended to prevent, and to protect the personal honor of our British officials; and the French statesmen have for many years been conscious, that Great Britain enjoys an immense harvest from its loose state. Our own statesmen have incessantly lamented it, and sought a remedy. France was not stranger to our early opinion, that the remedy was to be found in a commercial treaty. She was no stranger to the facts already enumerated, as to Mr. Adams's powers; nor to Jefferson's report to the commercial propositions in Congress. To give our neighboring powers the pressure on Mr. Hammond; and to the resentful speeches and motions of every session, predicated on the reluctance of Great Britain to treat with us on commerce. And yet, that France has ever hisped a dissatisfaction on the score of injury, is hidden from me. On the contrary, some who were privy to the French counsels, have endeavored to rile Mr. Eden on Great Britain, because she would not negotiate.

4th. You are by this time probably acquainted with the treaty with Great Britain, through the communications of Colonel Trumbull, and must have determined in your own mind its probable effect upon the French republic. Until it is published, you are at liberty to believe, that it is not the Convention's will, which I can little suppose, that you received to be prepared, an immediate and copious communication, and more particularly in relation to the British ministry. Whether the treaty with Great Britain affords just cause of offence to France? I am rather inclined to waive this inquiry for the present, in consequence of information that the French minister is considering an attack on the ratification of the treaty; and that sentiments, less eccentric than fatal to our independence, are to be scattered, at random, from a confidence in the popularity of the French cause.

As the present business is what it may, our Government will neither renounce its professions and friendly conduct to the French republic, nor subscribe any other conciliatory, when their agent may display. But the American correspondents in their letters have already (if newspapers may be credited) revived the old machinations and malicious stories of Genet. The fuel which his successor may add, from consideration and sources which I may, perhaps, hereafter explain, will receive a direction most calculated to excite a flame. A French war is every moment the expectation of an individual you may acquire, is our reflection. We acknowledge nothing to be undone on our part which friendship would dictate, our faculties could accomplish, and our neutrality would permit. If injuries are complained of, let us reason together as cordial allies and compensate where either may have been in fault. But let it be the last blot in the annals of the French, that the United States and France cease to be, what they ought to be, friends, who will endure no separation.

I now quit this lengthy subject; and shall, in other despatches, more precisely reply to the different letters which I have lately received from you.

I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 16th, 1795.

Sir:

It seemed probable, after the movement of the 12th German (3d of April) and which terminated in the banishment or rather demolition (for the hand of Government was never withdrawn from them) of Barrere, Bil-laude de Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois, and the assassination of several of the leading members in the Mountain party, that the Convention would be left at liberty to pursue, for the future, the great object of the Revolution, and without further molestation; and the calm which ensued, for a considerable time, that movement, although the scarcity of bread continued, gave strength to this presumption. But a late event has shown that the victory which was supposed by those who were attached to revolution, over the energies of the present government, was given up. There was reason to presume it would be: for, within a few days after my last, which was of the 17th of May, another attempt was made upon that body, and which menaced, for a while at least, in respect to the personal safety of their members. I am certain, after the conclusion of the Convention, I am happy, however. My answer was, that it might be, but it was likewise passed, and without producing, according to present prospects, and in regard to the main course of the Revolution, any material effect.

The circumstances which characterize this latter movement were, in general, the same with those of which preceding, and which were attempted with violence; and were violently and completely unfolded. On the 20th of May, a party from the faubours of St. Antoine and St. Marceau, armed, and consisting of some thousands, approached the Convention early in the morning, having previously circulated a paper that their object was a redress of grievances, of which the scarcity of bread was the principal, and which could only be accomplished by the establishment of the constituent body. In the evening of the following day, the government and his colleagues; or, in other words, the renewal of the reign of terror. As these measures could not be carried into immediate effect, without the overthrow of the preponderating party, so the movement appeared to be directed unequivocally to that object. The sentences of the condemned were pronounced, and, indeed, in another party, preceded by a legion of women, entered and spread itself throughout the hall of that assembly. The situation was broken, and very dangerous at this moment of confusion. In a contest which took place between Feratta, one of the deputies, a gallant and estimable member of the party, for the protection of the chair and person of the President, which were threatened with violence, the formers body, directed towards his face, was borne on a Pike by the perpetrators of this atrocity, in triumph, into the bosom of the Convent of the Inquisition. It seemed, for some time, as if that body, or at least the leading members in the preponderating party, were doomed to die. But they were not to be secured from a second and flight. During this conflict, however, the whole assembly of the convent was collected at a point that would have been a dishonor to the great theatre on which they stood; and Boissy d'Anglas, who happened to preside, not only kept his seat, but, on the contrary, did all in his power to maintain order and direct the tumult. Having so precipitately the hall, attacked the intruders, sabre and bayonet in hand, mere did they cease. Not until they had rescued the committees, the chair, and the committees of the month the Convent was re-established, and proceeded, as upon the former occasion, to a review of what had passed in the course of the day.

But the measures were in possession of the reins of Government, and after Boissy d'Anglas had retired, they placed the President Vernier in the chair, by force, and began an organization upon the principles that were first avowed. They retreated back, in a mass, all the laws that were passed since the 9th Thermidor; recalled Barrere, Billau de Varennes, and Collot d'Hervoir; took possession of the foison and the telegraph, ordered the barriers of the city to be closed, and were upon the point of arresting all the members of the committee of the executive branch, having appointed a committee of four deputies to take their places, and with full power to act in their stead, so that, in short, the hour was now near, and with accumulated force. At this moment, however, the plan of the committees, who had continued their sitting was ripe for execution, and fortunately the stroke was given before the system was completed.

But this was not ended by the expulsion of the insurgents from the hall of the Convent itself. They retreated back, but the executive branch, enraged, and more so, for a while, they opposed its authority. In the course, however, of the succeeding day, a considerable force was withdrawn, under the direction of a commit- vention, from those sections who voluntarily offered their service, amounting, perhaps, to fifteen thousand; and the insurrection, directed against them, and with accumulated force, was driven from the walls of the building, and thrown back beyond the city. The effect of this was immediate; and, at once, the measures which the insurgents for the previous day had thrown into a state of some confusion, were dispersed, and the situation of things was restored to that of the previous day. But this was likewise later suppressed by the efforts of good citizens, drawn by the representation of Barrere, e. c. the feebler voice of one aristocrat only was heard in favor of the constitution of 1789. Indeed the people, in the hope that, if a commotion took place, the 19th of October might come in, the standard of royalty would be erected, and the monarchy re-established, and who were, in the interval, from the dissensions that had arisen, the movement of which we have spoken, and which, had they been crushed before it had fully unfolded itself, of neither side, for nor against the Convention, were observed, in the commencement of this, to remain in the same state of inactivity, greatly agitated, but taking no part. As soon, however, as the object of this latter movement was understood, and it became obvious that, in case it succeeded, terrorism, and not royalty, would be re-established, the disposition of this party towards the Convention, But, in truth, the force of this party in this city, and especially upon the late emergencies, did not appear great. The most gallant of its members are either upon the frontiers, at war against the republic, or, rather, of sufficient force to disturb the Go- vernment in the manner you have seen, disposed to subvert the present system, and establish a system better to suit your expect. You will naturally be inclined to ask, of what character of citizens is it composed? what their nature, cannot be wished by any one. You have seen that the movement is quite general, and is not at all directed by the two factions of St. Antoine and St. Marceaux: the inquiry, therefore, will be satisfied by examining their character. In general, I am told, they are artisans, and among the most industrious in Paris. Many of them are said to be foreigners, and that the whole subject the motives of their partiality for the constitution of 1795, which naturalizes them. That they are opposed to monarchy, and the 19th of October, it is said, and main- tained by the people themselves, it follows, as they cannot be supposed to be political fanatics, and coming at royalty through the medium of terrorism, that the latter, and not the former, was the object of their influence. Many believe by many, the conclusion must be the same: for as royalty is un- questionable the object of those persons, it is to be supposed, that if they would hold upon its standard all those who were the friends of that system; whereas, by declaring of using their utmost endeavors to save the Convention, as the only means whereby they could save themselves.
FOREIGN RELATIONS.

In every view, therefore, they must be deemed enemies to royalty, and as such, it is natural to expect they will feel a great sensibility upon those questions which, in their judgment, have a tendency to promote it. Whether any such act has been agitated or contemplated is, perhaps, doubtful: I have thought otherwise, and still think so. But it is not in the nature of circumstances to have presented themselves, in the course of the collision of parties, that were sufficient to create a similar excitement among the other portion of the nation; and if the leading members of the preponderating party were prepared to abandon the republican scale, and incline towards monarchy, is certain. The inhabitants of these faubourgs having sided always with the Mountain party, have here found them themselves engaged in this no less than other cases. As such, therefore, or rather their leaders have, been, in their turn, persecuted by the royalists. But they have likewise themselves persecuted by the present preponderating party, with whom they were engaged in uninterrupted warfare, before and since the time of Robespierre. In this respect, therefore, they saw the present preponderating party and the royalists as so nearly alike, that the principle of revenge and the present example of persecution might be the same, and the same spirit of magnanimity which incited this disposition towards its antipodes, and clave for their political purposes, would dispose it to reject with disdain the aid of the royalists, who were enemies to both.

The sentiment is to be traced through all the measures of the Convention, from the 9th Thermidor to the 1st Prairial; for the destruction of the party by every measure of persecution and severity, and in every case, whilst they repudiated their principles; and terminating in other respects the reign of terror, whilst they avoided, as far as possible, the punishment of those who had been the principal authors and agents under that reign. Indeed, this party has appeared to me, and so I have often represented it to you, as equally the enemy of the opposite extreme, as of the party which had maintained the interest of monarchy. I could trace the spirit which I have concluded, and from those data the Revolution itself has furnished, as well as from my own observations of its process, (the latter of which, it is true, has been confined to a small circle) are desirous of a free republic, which should promote, by certain communications, to guard them against the pernicious consequences that always attend a degeneracy into either of these extremes.

You will likewise ask, what effect have these movements had upon the public mind, in regard to the present system? Is it not probable they have already wearied the people out, and in consequence inclined them to royalty, purely from a desire of repose? That they are wearied is most certain; and what may be the course of events, in the progress of time, I do not pretend to determine: these lie beyond my reach, and indeed beyond the reach of all men. I only undertake to deduce immediate consequences from the facts which I witness; and when I see that these events have thereby been produced to prevent the support of the party, to the present, to renounce their creed, and cling to the Convention for their safety, I cannot presume that the moderates, who are republicans, will quit the sound ground on which they rest, too early, and become royalty. Therefore, I reconcile, I consider at present as altogether out of the question. But that these convulsive shocks, and which are produced to an extreme, may produce some effect, is probable. In my opinion, they will produce a good one: for I am persuaded they will occasion, and upon the report of the committee of eleven, some very important changes in the constitution of 1793; such as a division of the Legislature into two branches, with an organization of the executive and judiciary upon more independent principles than that constitution admits of; upon those principles, indeed, which exist in the American confederation, and are well understood there. Should this be the case, the republican system will have a fair experiment here; and it may be the case, must be the wish of all those who are the friends of humanity everywhere.

It is now the third month of the year, and the communication is, therefore, Mr. Pinckney arrived here on his way to Madrid, and was a spectator of the great scene it exhibited to the close: a few days after which he pursued his route, by the way of Bordeaux, where, before this, he is probably arrived. Whilst here, I presented to his view what had passed between this Government and myself upon the subject of his mission: assuring him, from what I had heard and seen, that I was of opinion that this nation would explain the conduct of the insurgent party, in their pursuit of their purposes, and by what aid they conveniently could in support of his negotiation; satisfying them, at the same time, that they were not injured by Mr. Jay's treaty, they would do it. I likewise showed him a letter I had just received from Mr. Short, written at the instance of the Duke de la Acedia, to request that I would send them any certain information of this Government, a negotiation between Spain and this republic, he having previously and positively informed Mr. Short that our demands should be yielded and adjusted at the same time. Mr. Pinckney was sensible of the benefit which the aid of this republic could yield in his negotiation, and wished it; but upon mature consideration, was of opinion he could not request such aid without being prepared to view Mr. Jay's treaty, and with which he did not choose to do, for considerations delicacy forbade me to inquire into. It was, however, equal in his and my wish that his journey through the country should be marked with all those circumstances of reciprocal civility between the Government and himself, which are always due, and generally paid, when the bearer of a letter of a foreigner is informed upon the committee, and obtained for him an amicable interview with the members of its diplomatic section, and by whom he was received with the most respectful attention.

But it is clearly seen that England and Spain are each, and without the knowledge of the other, seeking a separate peace with this republic. What the motive for such secrecy on the part of the former is, remains to be hereafter unfolded: but what it is on the part of the latter is easily understood: for as she apprehends, in case a peace is made with France, a declaration of war from England, and of course in case the attempt to obtain peace is known, some new pressure from that Power, it follows that she must wish the arrangement to be complete, to guard her against the ill consequences which might otherwise attend such an event before any thing upon that head transpires. As soon, however, as it is known to Spain that England seeks a separate peace, her jealousy of the views of England will be excited, and she will be more inclined to seek for an ally than a friend, for her own safety, therefore, when a good understanding, embracing, perhaps, the ancient connection between the two nations, will be revived, cannot be considered as remote. Whether our claims upon Spain will be attended to, under existing circumstances, in that adjustment, is a point upon which it is impossible for me to deliberate: for, as I understand, the object of that negotiation, which is the object of it in their own behalf, I have lately foreborne all further communication with the committee upon that subject. Mr. Pinckney will be able, soon after his arrival at Madrid, to ascertain the temper of the Spanish court in regard to our demands, and the means by which his information may be obtained, and I have made him a precise knowledge of the ground I have taken in the line in which, if in any, I may be serviceable; and in the interim, I shall not only be prepared to co-operate with whatever movement he may suggest, but to obey with promptitude any instructions you may be pleased to give me in this or any other respect.

Since my last, the treaty with the United Provinces has been concluded and ratified, and the garrison of Luxembourg, consisting of 12,000 men, with an immense amount in military stores, cannon, &c. has surrendered. The Since my last, it is reduced to a certainty that the British Government has revived its order of the 6th November, 1793, and commenced, on this side the Atlantic, the same system of warfare and pilage upon our commerce that was practised on it by that Government at that very calamitous epoch. Between thirty and forty sail, of which the provisions, having been already taken from their destination and carried into those of that island; and, as the period has arrived, when the invitation which the distresses of this country gave to our merchants here and at home, to embark their fortunes in this supply, is likely to produce its effect, is more than probable that other vessels, and to a great amount, will share the like fate. Among those of our countrymen who are disposed to see in this a just vengeance on the part of France, for the past insults she has put upon the firms of the individual, who was distinguished for his services and attachment to our country, entitle his memory to some attention, and doubt not your letter of acknowledgment, addressed to his son, on that head, through me, will be gratefully received.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 9th, 1795.
tenanted by the movements which took place here some time after those assurances were given. But, when it is seen that the country is in distress, and, upon the whole, with unexampled patience, are quiet, and in the possession of the fruits of a plentiful harvest, as part of the case, it is doubtful whether a change will not soon take place in the temper of those on the other side of the channel.

What part it becomes our country to take at this crisis, belongs not to me to say. Peace is a blessing which ought not to be wantonly thrown away. But, whether sufficient sacrifices have not already made to preserve it, and the time arrived when the duty owe to ourselves, and the respect which is due to the opinion of the world, admonish us that the insults and injuries of Britain are to be no longer borne, and that we ought to seek redress by the most effectual means. The way to arrive at the true and lasting cause upon the event of war, is a point, which will, no doubt, be wisely decided by those who have a right to decide this. Permit me, however, to observe, in case any active measure is taken, or likely to be taken, in consequence of these aggressions, that you will immediately apprise me of it, that I may, without delay, begin to make a corresponding impression upon the councils of this nation.

I omitted in my last to transmit to you a copy of the letter from Mr. Short, which I mentioned was shown to Mr. Pinckney; and which, as it demonstrates how completely we may command success in our demands upon Spain, provided France aids us in that respect, ought not to be withheld, and especially in the present state of our affairs in Europe, that political and commercial intercourse, and I am happy to say, that is conceived here in this country, is of the utmost importance for you to possess, it will reflect honor on Mr. Short, upon account of the able and comprehensive view he has taken of the subject.

I am free to inform you that the committee of eleven have at length reported a plan of government, of which I herewith enclose you a copy. The discussion upon the merits will commence in a few days, and as soon as the question is finally decided, I will transmit to you the result.

Mr. Short to Mr. Monroe.

Aranjuez, May 4, 1795.

DEAR SIR,

I have waited for your answer to my late letters, and particularly that of the 11th of April, before writing to you again, if it had not been for the particular circumstance which makes the subject of this. I have already mentioned to you the desire of this Government to open the way to a pacification with the French commonwealth. This notion is the basis of a kind of negotiation, although perhaps an unofficious one, was on foot. I am persuaded in that opinion, and you may consider as an intimation to the person who is under your command, here, to whom you sent me a letter enclosed in yours of the 6th of February last, and the person by whom those letters were written. I have good reason to believe that this business has met with some kind of delay as to the articles which I have mentioned, at least there is a prospect that the circumstances of Mr. Pinckney's appointment for that purpose rendering it necessary that they should be delayed for his arrival here. Although they would be afraid to enter openly on negotiation, without being previously sure of its success, lest they should find themselves between two fires. The apprehension of England has certainly restrained them lately, and not any aversion to peace with the French commonwealth, which, on the contrary, they desire most sincerely and ardently.

Under these circumstances, the friendly interference of the United States has been wished for by this Government. I have already explained to you the difficulties which presented themselves to me, from the points in litigation between this and the French commonwealth, and the circumstances of Mr. Pinckney's appointment for that purpose rendering it necessary that they should be delayed for his arrival here. Although they would be afraid to enter openly on negotiation, without being previously sure of its success, lest they should find themselves between two fires. The apprehension of England has certainly restrained them lately, and not any aversion to peace with the French commonwealth, which, on the contrary, they desire most sincerely and ardently.

I have the fullest assurances from this Government, that all matters shall be settled to the satisfaction of the United States and although present circumstances ensure whatever the United States may now desire here, yet, under my circumstances, I should have chosen not taking an active interference until I should have conferred with Mr. Pinckney, and he with this Government. For a long time I had no doubt Mr. Pinckney would have been here long ere this. I suppose he must be, at present, somewhere in France, on his way hither; but I have received no letter from him since that of the 6th of March. Things would have probably gone on in this way until his arrival, viz., this Government considering themselves with the powers and on foot between the two persons mentioned above, and perhaps also between the Generals of the two armies, if nothing had occurred to make them more anxious to accelerate the business; but this has taken place in consequence of the treaty concluded between the French commonwealth and the King of Prussia.

The Duke de la Alcudia has now mentioned to me his desire that no further time should be lost, and that an active negotiation should be immediately opened; declaring to me confidentially, and authorizing me to mention to you, his real and sincere wish to conclude immediately a treaty with the French commonwealth; desiring, however, that it may be known that there shall not be any suspicion of haste or impatience, until the conclusion and ratification of the treaty. He has, therefore, requested me to communicate this to the minister of the United States at Paris, and to add his desire to receive here, for the purpose of concluding this treaty, the person whom you have appointed for that purpose, and remain here, in a secret way, until the business should be concluded and ratified. The desire of the Government for this reason, as you will perceive, is the same as it is from the apprehension of England. This he wishes you to propose to the French Government, if you find it will be acceptable to them. This is the nature of his request to me, and which I have not thought it proper, for several reasons, to decline. Several of these not taking an active interference until I should have conferred with Mr. Pinckney, and he with this Government.

Having thus stated the request of the Duke in the simplest form, it is for you to decide thereon what you may think advisable to do and in which you will, of course, be guided by what you conceive to be for the interest of the United States, and conformable to the wishes of the Government where you reside, whose interests are co-incidental with those of the United States.

It may not be improper to subjoin here some incidental remarks which took place between the minister here and myself, on the above occasion. In stating to me his wish that this business should be concluded as soon as possible, he observed that he had a personal interest and inclination at the same time; that he wished this treaty to be grounded; but that he had no such person there; and that it would be impossible for him to send one, without its being found out here or at Paris, by England. On my mentioning the probability of the same discovery being made, if the French Government should send a person here, he said there would be much less difficulty, if this person were charged not to discover himself, or to pass for an American; and that the communications between him and the minister here might pass through my hands, so as to remove all suspicion of his being a person charged with a negotiation.

I think it proper to communicate this desire of the Duke de la Alcudia to the French Government, you will observe that nothing in writing has passed between us, and that his request to me is made only verbally. Although I have not the smallest doubt myself, of the full and unequivocal sincerity with which he has thus opened himself to me, yet I would not choose to induce the French Government to adopt the measure proposed, without, at the same time, informing you that the course which he has proposed me to take, yet more particularly, to enter into negotiation for peace, and should choose to have some written ground, I suppose it probable the minister would not refuse to communicate to me in confidence, in writing, his desire above mentioned; if he should, he would be more particular in explaining an article of such great consequence. For, of course, with the French Government, you will be able to judge what is the mode that would be most acceptable to them in the conducting a negotiation with this country, if they do not approve that suggested by the Duke; and if they do, then it is proper to communicate it to me, I will ascertain here the sentiments of the minister respecting the mode that be proposed.

So much for the mode of the negotiation; it may not be improper to add something respecting the substance of it.

It would seem natural that the Duke should have given me some intimation of the conditions on which he wished the peace to be settled with the republic; but I did not choose to press this head, because it did not seem to be the proper time to be asking for particulars, and also because, as he knows my attachment to France, in common with many others, I thought it would tend further my friends to be without being absolutely necessary. From our conversation, however, as well on this, as on preceding occasions, I find his desire would be to avoid, if possible, contracting any article which might force this country into an immediate war with England. He is determined to risk that event, however, if the simple deviation from the convention of May 30, and the Proclamation of Neutrality, should not be reversible. Moreover, that Spain's making a separate peace would not induce England to declare war against her under present circumstances. He would desire, therefore, to conclude a peace as simple as possible. He would choose to avoid guarantying to France the island of Corsica, and such parts of the East Indies as are within the Spanish jurisdiction for some time; to leave an immediate war with England. But the desire of this country is that France should reconquer those places, as it is the real interest of Spain that they should belong to France rather than to England. I mention these things merely as the first desire of the minister; how far he might be induced to alter the condition with the Portugal republic, will appear in the course of the negotiation, if it should be opened. The greatest difficulty will be as to the parts of Spain conquered by France; and I apprehend, as I have mentioned above, that some difficulty has already shown itself as probable, as to the place of Figueras. It is the business of negotiation, of course, to remove difficulties.

In answer to Mr. Pinckney's last letter, asking more time before sending an agent here, and will inform you how far they wish previously to be made acquainted with the outlines of the sentiments of this court, it is probable the minister would communicate them. At the same time, he would probably expect an equal mark of confidence, through you a member, of his movements, on the same head, of the French Government.

This letter will be forwarded by the minister, through the frontiers, by a flag; you will therefore soon receive it. I will thank you immediately to acknowledge the receipt thereof, and to let me know, as soon as possible, whether you have judged it proper to take any step in consequence thereof, and what shall have been the result thereof. Send your letters, on this subject, by the same way by which you sent that of the 8th of February; the last I have received from you. I have as yet no answer from the President, as to the absence from hence which I have asked. I hope, ere long, to have the pleasure of renewing to you, in person, the assurances of my being sincerely your friend and servant.

Mr. Monroe to Mr. Short.

PARIS, May 30, 1795.

I was favored, about ten days past, with yours of the 24th instant, and should have answered it immediately, had I not previously done so by anticipation, in some measure, in one of the same date through the armies, or had I not waited for the arrival of Mr. Pinckney, who was then on his way from Dunkirk for this place. By him this will be forwarded; and I am informed to deem it absolutely necessary for me, therefore, to permit me to assure you, that this Government will admit of no intermediate or third parties in its negotiations, but will only treat with its enemies themselves, or directly. The only Power whose good offices they ever thought of accepting was the United States; but the negotiation of Mr. Jay with England has, by its manner, and particular spirit, precluded all such idea. You and our friends in France are assured that they are disposed not even to accept of ours. This is a fact of importance which I did not choose to hazard through the course of the armies, since, if it was known to the Spanish Government, it might lessen our weight in the negotiation with that court; for I always know that an opinion of a good understanding between us and this Government would greatly facilitate our business both with France or with the States; and as you may judge of the object of your negotiation to a close as soon as possible, counting, with certainty, that, although, in general, we stand well here, yet we are to have no agency in the affairs of France, and, of course, are to derive, from that consideration, no aid to the advancement of our own.

It is proper to inform you that, just before the report of Mr. Jay's treaty reached us, this Government, whose attachment to us was daily increasing, had in it contemplation to extend, by all the means in its power, its fortunes to us, in our depending negotiations elsewhere; and that, even since that report, upon the presumption every thing is right, these instructions (as I am told) their minister, negotiating with Spain, to secure in their treaty the points insisted on by us.

This instruction was given just before the report of Mr. Pinckney's appointment was known, and I am inclined to think that although it was not in Mr. Pinckney's power (not being at this instant Mr. Jay's minister) to give without which, it would have been indecisive) to ask their aid, that the instructions still continue in force. In any event Spain will have all possible proof, and from this Government itself, that they wish us well, and rejoice in our prosperity, and, therefore, although they keep their own affairs to themselves, yet the Spanish court will find that a good understanding is preserved, and a good understanding is preserved to these points of our policy.

I have heard that Mr. Jay has stipulated something in his treaty respecting the Mississippi; whereby, upon the ridiculous pretence of a guarantee to us, an extension of territory is substantially given to Britain, and she, in consequence, admitted to the Mississippi. The fact of a guarantee by Britain to us must excite the indignation of Spain towards her, though ready to yield the point to us; but the extension of her territory so as to comprehend the source of that river, and thereby entitle her to its navigation, will produce a more serious and alarming effect. I think it will tend greatly to separate Spain from England, and to force the former into a more intimate connexion with France and the United States. The first step towards which is an accommodation to their present demands.

Another circumstance which will facilitate this object is, that England, through Sir F. Eden, has absolutely and very lately, attempted, upon the pretext of an exchange of prisoners, to open a negotiation for peace with this respect. Spain knows nothing of this, but I am assured, by authority in which I confide, that it is the truth. He was refused two of his letter-mates, and has terms sent to the committee, and an answer received, peremptorily rejecting them. If true, I presume the fact will be made known to Spain, so that the latter Power ought to reject all delicacy towards the former in its transactions with it. Spain, in her turn, owing the necessity of despatches, if possible, in our negotiation with Spain. Suppose her peace made with this republic; she is, of course, relieved from the pressure which disposes her to accommodate us. Shall we not afterwards stand of course nearly on the same ground that we stood in that negotiation, from the epoch of the one which was conducted by Mr. Jay with Mr. Gardoqui, which had well nigh ended (this I am informed they were according to it) with the tutelary relation of Spain. It has the habit of the river, and dismemberment of the continent; which negotiation has certainly deluded the Spanish Government, from that time to the present day, into an opinion that half America wish it shut; at least, to me (who was in the Congress) according the tendency of that negotiation, and who have since seen your correspondence) such appeared to be the case.

The above are hints upon the real state of things here, upon which Mr. Pinckney and yourself will take your measures. If I could satisfy this Government that Mr. Jay's treaty contained nothing of which they have a right to complain, every thing would be easy here; we might forward the views of the two countries, which, in respect to this, I ardently wish to forward, making previously those of our own secure. But can any motive of interest, on the part of France, induce her to accept such offers from us, until she shall receive such satisfaction for her former injuries, as would induce her to receive its right, or their request, that it might be attempted anything in concert with you, and shall, therefore, be always happy to hear from you in these respects.

I enclose you a letter from a friend of yours in this country, being assured it contains nothing of a treasonable nature, no intelligence of the march of armies, or preparations against Spain, which is the interest of this Government to keep secret.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, July 6, 1795.

Sir:

About three or four weeks past, one of our vessels, which touched at Havre from England, was taken in charge by the French authorities, and the captain and passengers confined, upon a suspicion they had brought false assignats with them, with a view of circulating them. They were also accused of having drawn in several instances libels and libel-sheets through the city in behalf of a foreigner. Complete search was made upon the vessel, but no assignats were found. As I knew that the suspicion which was entertained ought not to be extended to three young men who were passengers, I immediately applied to the commission for their release, and obtained it, and other persons were released by the municipality at Havre before it reached them. But, as I was not acquainted with the character of the captain, or any others belonging to the vessel, and was aware of the right the Government had to protect itself from injuries of every kind, and from every quarter, and, of course, to search the vessel, and as I also hoped, in case the assignats were not found, that no intention existed to prevent the vessel from sailing, I did not choose, in that stage, to apply likewise in their behalf. After the search was made, and the Government satisfied it had suspected without cause, the captain was put at liberty, and the vessel offered back to him. But, beholding his ship, and seeing his vessel was suspected for his neglect which ensued his arrestation, he seemed disposed rather to throw the whole upon the Government, and demand an indemnity for it, and, with which view, he lately came here to confer with me. I advised him to gather up what he could of his own property, and pursue his voyage according to his original destination, limiting his claim merely to France, and refraining from suggesting that he might wait his protest and other documents from Havre, reserving to himself the liberty of acting, after their receipt, as he pleases, and according as the precedents of examples of the like kind, and whose details he will in the interim acquire, may admonish him will be most for his interest. I shall endeavor to obtain justice for him, upon sound principles, and have only mentioned the case that you may know such a one has happened, and what the circumstances of it are.

The jealousy which is entertained by this Government of the commerce carried on by our countrymen between the United States and the several countries, has latterly given rise to considerable inconvenience to many of our citizens, and I am fearful will yet produce some more disagreeable effects. A Mr. Eldred was lately apprehended at Mar- seilles, and sent here under guard, upon a charge of having intelligence to the British of some movement in the Mediterranean fleet. Upon inquiry, I found that he had my passport, granted (to upon the most substantial documents, proving him to be an American subject. He is of disagreeable character, although born in America, yet he was not there in the course of our Revolution, but in England; nor had he been there. From what I hear of him, he is not a person of mischievous disposition, nor one who would be apt to conspire or act in any manner injurious to America, and upon this, I do not know I can officially interfere in his behalf: for, when once a principle is departed from, it ceases to be a principle.

More lately, I was requested by the commission of foreign affairs to prohibit our consuls from granting passports, and which was immediately done. I was afterwards requested by him to furnish a list of the Americans accused in France of those violations of the foreign commercial laws, and all instances of disorder that have occurred, promised, and will be punctually executed. I therewith send you a copy of my instructions to the consuls, and correspondence with the commission, on this subject.

You will readily perceive that this jealousy proceeds from the circumstance that many of those who are actually engaged in this trade are of that description of persons who, having latterly become citizens of the United States, are likewise subjects of England; nor can you be surprised, when that circumstance is considered without any imputation on the character of the parties, that this jealousy should exist. They are English themselves, their con- nexion is English, their conduct is English, and it is a natural tendency in any country that has been under English protection: this kind should draw after it suspicion, or rather it would be unnatural if it did not produce that effect. To the people of this country this is an evil of serious import: for, by it, it is obvious that the confidence which is due to our national character and dispositions, is diminished. Nor can the mortification which is incident to such a situation be otherwise than heightened, when it is considered that we are most a prey to this evil, at the moment when the Government, which through these persons belaus our national dignity, and tramples on our rights. Be assured I shall do every thing in my power to guard us against injuries of this kind, by excluding all who are not, and upon the principles agreed upon my first arrival here, strictly entitled to our protection; and, by which line of conduct, I hope I shall succeed, in a great measure, if not altogether, in the accomplishment of an object so important to our welfare.

As connected with this subject, permit me to mention another, which I deem equally important, and more remediable. A gentleman who has been at Hamburg, as consular for the United States, A Parish, who has held that office for some years past. This gentleman has been threatened, arrested, and with some circumstances of violence attached to it, has been brought to Paris, who have been at Hamburg, and who come here, unite in representing him to be (comparatively with England) as unfriendly to America, or as absolutely unfriendly to France and the French Revolution; and which traits are said to be pointed out in some points with probably ultimate settle. It is natural that a commission, in this kind should draw after it suspicion, or rather it would be unnatural if it did not produce that effect. To the people of this country this is an evil of serious import: for, by it, it is obvious that the confidence which is due to our national character and dispositions, is diminished. Nor can the mortification which is incident to such a situation be otherwise than heightened, when it is considered that we are most a prey to this evil, at the moment when the Government, which through these persons belaus our national dignity, and tramples on our rights. as an act of barbarity, excelled only by those which were formerly perpetrated in the same neighborhood by the in terminable mountain. It is believed that a treaty has taken place between England and Russia, in which the former has stipulated not to take the side of Poland against the latter; in consideration whereof, Russia is to furnish England a certain number of ships during the residuum of the war. It is likewise believed that England has announced to Spain that, to case the latter makes peace with France, she will commence immediate hostilities upon her. This may possibly keep Spain in a state of suspense some time longer. On the other hand, it is obvious that the connexion between France and Holland, Denmark and Sweden, becomes daily stronger; whilst Austria, paralyzed by the peace and movements of Prussia, which threaten an entire change in the Germanic system, and such an arrangement of its parts as will give an entire preponderance to Prussia, scarcely knows what part to take; whether to make peace or continue the war. It is the interest of Prussia that Austria should continue the war; for the pressure of France upon the art of revolutionizing the views of the Empire into her arms, with a view of securing their peace with France, through the intercession of Prussia.

In conversation a few days past with Baron Stael, ambassador from Sweden, he informed me of a communication forwarded by the court of Sweden to Mr. Pinckney at London, London Government, and upon which no answer was given, although it was much wished. I desired his communication in writing, that I might forward it to you, and which was accordingly given, and is herewith transmitted. I have no doubt that whatever he says to me is known to the committee, as it was informed by some of the members in the beginning of the winter, and before the Baron arrived, that such an application had been made to us from that quarter. It belongs to me only to forward this paper, and which I do, not doubting that I shall be instructed relative thereto, in the most suitable manner.

Colonel Humphreys has just arrived, and, upon due consideration, I presented last night a paper to the committee, opening, as far as was evident, the object of his visit and upon which subject generally I shall be more full in my next, when I hope to be possessed of an answer.

The Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

Philadelphia, July 31, 1795.

Sir: My indisposition disables me from writing a long letter at this moment. But the opportune conveyance by Mr. Gibson, supercargo of the ship Molly (whom I recommend to your notice and patronage, on public and private considerations) will not suffer me to omit the forwarding of the papers at foot. Among them is the treaty, &c. as public correspondence between Mr. Adet and myself upon it. Since my letter to him, I have heard nothing from him.
The treaty is not ratified by the President, nor will it be ratified, I believe, until it returns from England, if the President will not now ratify it. But I do not mean this for a public communication, or for any public body or men. I am engaged in a work, which, when finished, and approved by the President, will enable me to speak precisely to you. The late British order for seizing provisions is a weighty obstacle to a ratification. I do not suppose that such an attempt to starve France will be condescended.

By Mr. Pinckney, who leaves the United States for France the day after to-morrow, I shall write to you again, I am, &c.

EDM. RANDOLPH.

The Secretary of State of the United States to Mr. Monroe.

Philadelphia, July 9, 1795.

Sir: By a past opportunity, I did myself the honor of sending to you a printed copy of the proposed treaty between the United States and Great Britain; with it was bound up a copy of the act of our Senate. The want of precedent for such a mode of ratification; the doubts, whether they meant to sit in judgment again upon the article to be added; whether the President can ratify without re-submitting the new article to them; whether he can ratify before he himself inspects the new article, after it shall have been assented to by the British King; and what effects the suspension of the 19th article will have upon all those subsequent to the 10th, create difficulties and delays, even independent of the real merits of the treaty. The newspapers which have been forwarded to you, will show the unpopularity of the treaty at Boston. Yesternight, New York exhibited a similar scene. It will probably be re-acted in Philadelphia tomorrow, and will travel, perhaps, farther. The complaints are numerous from the friends of the treaty, that the condemnations of it have proceeded from unfair practices. Upon this I can, as yet, say nothing; but will wait until some counter assemblies, which are said to be contemplated, shall have published their sentiments. When I inform you that the President has not yet ratified the treaty, his character will convince you that nothing will deter him from doing what he thinks right, and that the final question lies open from causes unconnected with any considerations but the interest and duties of the United States. He is at present in Virginia, and will, doubtless, very soon take his conclusive step. If I were permitted to conjecture what that would be, I should suspect that, at any rate, he would not sign it until it should return from England, with the addition of the suspending article, and probably not even then, if a late British order for the capture of provisions, going to France, should have been issued, as we suppose, and increase the objections which have been harrassed upon it.

The present may be well considered as a crisis, taken either upon the supposition of a ratification or rejection.
In the latter case, the result with Great Britain is not so easily foreseen. In the former, the result in our own country is involved with many delicate and hazardous topics. It is my consolation, however, that he who guides the helm, will, by his fortitude and wisdom, steer us into safe port.

EDM. RANDOLPH, Secretary of State.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, August 1st, 1795.

Sir: I was sorry to find, some days after my last, that the disquietude which I intimated existed in the councils of this republic, and to which its ports are submitted, has continued. It has, however, assumed a form still more unpleasant in regard to us, than I then apprehended it would do: for, whilst the subject of discussion between the commissary and myself, and, as I thought, approaching towards a close, the committee interterposed, and taking the business out of his hands, addressed me on the same subject, and to the same effect, laying at the same time the draught of a decree before the Convention, the principal object of which was to proclude all those, who were not born within the jurisdiction of the neutral Powers, from the protection of the ministers of those Powers here. The decree, you will observe, was made general, as well as the letter which preceded it from the committee. I had, however, seen too much of the business not to know that, in regard to others, it was formal only, whilst it was, in reality, pointed against a particular description of our own citizens, and of Englishmen, who, by means of American passports obtained elsewhere, and, no doubt, by fraud, sometimes passed for such.
As I presumed it was not the intention of the committee or Convention, that the decree should be construed and executed strictly, because you knew in principle it could not be supported, and because I likewise knew that many of those who it would thereby comprehend, were resident and valuable members of our community, and had been, and now were, by their commerce, useful to France, I demanded immediately an explanation from the committee, of the decree, and soon afterwards obtained an interview with that body; in which I was explicitly assured that they did not mean this call in question any principle insisted on by us; that their only wish was to exclude Englishmen; and that, in regard to myself, they meant to impose on me no restraint, in granting passports, I had not already observed. Thus, this business has happily terminated precisely where it ought to do, without producing any real change here, or rather effect any where which can be hurtful to the cause of liberty. But the aid of this Government will be given in support of our negotiation with Algiers, &c. Upon this you may, I think, count with certainty, as I have been assured of it by the committee, and am furnished with all the light which their past negotiations with that regency enable them to give us on that subject. Difficulties in that quarter, I apprehend, would, and ought to be, the very faculties of the government, to produce a war here; and I see with satisfaction that the cause or this Government is, in any event, to prevent the failure of the treaty on that account. Colonel Humphreys is still here upon this business; and, as we devote our unremitted attention to it, you may be assured that no measure necessary to its success will be omitted that we are capable of.

With respect to the emigrant army, which lately landed in the bay of Quiberon, under the auspices of Great Britain, has been completely defeated, and its whole force, amounting to about ten thousand men, either slain or taken prisoners; of which about four thousand were slain. Many of those who composed that army, are said to have been raised by compulsion, from among French prisoners, and were of course immediately set at liberty. By the law, all the others are doomed to suffer capital punishments; but it is to be hoped, as many of them are weak and misguided men, its rigor will be moderated, at least in regard to them.

Within a few days past, also, a peace was concluded with Spain whereby the whole of the island of St. Domingo is ceded to France, the latter yielding in consideration made in this war. That there are some secret articles is more than probable. I herewith send you a copy of the treaty, as of the details which attended the defeat and destruction of the emigrant army, according to the report thereof rendered by Tallien, who was in mission with the republican army in that quarter.

I have heard nothing since mine to you of the 14th of June last. I think I may soon hear something on that subject, either from this Government or from Mr. Pinckney; in which case I will immediately advise you of it. It is likely the event of the case will have a somewhat the same turn as the former, that is to say, and I am not at all surprised in consequence of the proposal which I made in the case it will, no doubt, be the wish of the former to involve us in it on her side. But this I hope will not take effect; because, under existing circumstances, it would not only produce many unhappy consequences, but because I am of opinion, if Mr. P. finds difficulties, that the object may yet be produced by a change of the French government, as soon as I am enabled to show that Mr. M. does not propose anything injurious to this republic. Doubtless France will now have great weight in the councils of Spain; and, most certainly, if we continue in friendship with France, and of which there can be no doubt, it will be possible to avail ourselves of it in support of our claims there.

These two great events do not certainly produce the most important consequences, as well in securing tranquility at home as in cutting off all remaining hope of success, on the part of the Powers still at war with this republic. Indeed the probability is that peace will soon be made with the Italian Powers, and even with Austria. But with England, so peculiar is the relation between the two countries, that it is impossible to say when peace will take place, or on what condition it will be made. For the least inattention upon that point. An adjustment, however, with all the other Powers, may possibly induce an accommodation between these sooner than present circumstances authorize the expectation of.

The time of the debarkation of the emigrant army, some symptoms were seen here which gave cause for suspicion that there was a party in Paris which wished to, at least, attempt to overthrow the reign of terror, and become very fashionable among those who had suffered under that reign, and by some accidental circumstances was placed in a kind of rivalry, or rather opposition, to the Marseillois lyceum. The young men of Paris, the relatives of many of whom had suffered under the reign of terror, formed a party who were in general in favor of the "Revolu du Peuple," often calling for it at the theatres in preference to the Marseillois lyceum, and which circumstance never failed to give uneasiness to many who were present. Light as this accident was, yet it seemed, at one time, to menace some ill consequences. The presumption whereof was indeed so strong, that the enemies of the Revolution, who were said to be stimulat the young men on, seemed to count upon it as a sort of signal which would startle the republican garrets, and actually some excesses were committed by the young men, and in which they thought they had a right to indulge, in defiance of the authority of the Convention, upon whose power they presumed they had some claim for services rendered in the latter. In this case, however, evidently the law, inasmuch as the Marseillois continue their republican mode of conducting public business, or indeed of law, could not be justified. It might, on the contrary, have been called an insurrection, and a little rigor would have made it one. The Convention, however, acted more wisely, by considering it for a while as a frolic, and finally, by issuing a proclamation, telling them calmly of the folly and imprudence of their conduct, and that they had exposed themselves to render the Republic, and of course their own safety, the sufferer of the acts of which could be their interest or intention to endanger. This mode of proceeding produced the happiest effect: for even before the reduction of the emigrant army, and peace with Spain, tranquility was in a great measure established; but since those two events, it has been completely so.

The Convention is still employed upon the subject of the constitution, which will probably be gone through in the course of two weeks more. As soon as it is adopted, and of which there can be no doubt, and upon the principles generally proposed in the project reported by the commission, I will forward you a copy.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, August 17th, 1795.

Sir: I have not been honored with any communication from you since that of the 26th May last, though, doubtless, others are on their way, and which I shall soon receive. A day or two past Philadelphia papers were received as late as the 3d of July, containing Mr. Jay's treaty, together with such proceedings of the Senate upon it as were then published. As these gazettes are circulating everywhere, I conclude some of them are in possession of the committee of public safety, and that the committee would feel it in their honor to publish the papers they have received at Havre. Of late I have heard nothing from the committee upon this subject, nor do I expect to hear any thing from them very soon, as they will employ all their time in preparing for the meeting by which they mean to impress the impression which it may, otherwise than in reply to such communication as I may make thereon, and respecting which, it may be advisable to add, that whatever is said in the present movement, the propriety of it, or will be, adopted in regard to it, and upon which, in its relation to this republic, this conduct will be particularly marked out, so I deem it my indispensable duty to avoid the insertion of the slightest compromise either of you or myself upon that subject. I mention this only that you may discharge the completely the final result of this business, so far as it depends on me, as, in fact, it ought to be, under your control.

As I have had no communication with this Government upon the subject of this treaty since its contents were known, it is of course impossible for me to say what the impression it has made is. It is as easy for you, with the lights you have, to form a proper opinion upon that point in Philadelphia, as for me to do it here. One circumstance, however, I think proper to bring to your view. Soon after the British Government had recommenced the seizure of our vessels destined for the ports of France, it was notified to the committee for a sequel to this Government, who had just returned from England, that he had been advised there, through a channel to be relied on, that the British administration had said they knew that measure would not be offensive to our Government; or, in other words, that it would be a decided infringement upon our rights. Observation with contempt, and a short time to hear that it was considered nearly in the same light by the committee itself.

But since the arrival of the treaty, I have understood that, in connexion with that report, the attention of many has been drawn with some degree of solicitude to the contents of the second paragraph of the 18th article, and who say that, as that article leaves the law of nations unsettled, and provides payment for seizures in case of this Government, and of course for those which are not contraband, the complaints of our citizens are prevented, and the British construction by implication countenanced, this republic has a right to complain of it. I mention this objection to you in order to be aware of it in case it should ever be brought forward, I think, that probable those seizures are not noticed in some very pointed manner. It is painful for me to give you a detail of this kind; but, being an interesting fact, I do not see what propriety it can be withheld.

It is well known the constitution will be completed in the course of a few days, and of which I will immediately afterwards forward you a copy. The discussion upon this very important subject has been conducted with great temper, and the harmony of opinion throughout greater than could have been expected.

The report of Pichegru having crossed the Rhine, as heretofore intimated, was without foundation. The height of the water, occasioned by continual rains, has hitherto prevented it. It is, however, said, that he has orders to cross it, and is now making the necessary movements for that purpose. The enemy are on the opposite side, watchful of his measures; but, from his skill, the strength and enterprise of his army, success is counted on as certain.

No indication presents itself of an approaching peace between France and England, or of even a negotiation for it. It appears the British are not prepared for a negotiation, and upon this view, that mine were by the admiral at Halifax. It was, doubtless, an object of importance with the British Government to know what were the inferior measures of the President in regard to England. If such were the case, the Secretary of Mr. Jefferson was to be fully upon that head, and immediately after the decision was taken, I cannot otherwise account why your letters have not reached me.

I sincerely wish to hear from you as soon as possible upon that subject; because, if, in the further pursuit of our claims upon both countries, this is requisite to be done, it is evident, if true, what I have said, what manner, and the Convention, and of peace as a desirable object. It is probable, however, when a negotiation commences, it will be short for, as I presume the oveture will come from England, so it is equally probable that none will be made by us, or that the conversation is disposed to receive in the terms of France. These, I presume, are in your wrath, and we are sure known to England, at least I expect so; a consideration which I particularly suggest at present, with a view of turning your attention to these symptoms which may be discovered on the other side of the channel, as data by which you may estimate either remote or immediate approaches towards this important event.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, September 16th, 1795.

Sir: A private letter of the 31st of May is the last with which I have been honored from you, and, no more than three months have since elapsed, I am inclined to believe that some of your dispatches are carried into England, and treated with the same violence that mine were by the admiral at Halifax. It was, doubtless, an object of importance with the British Government to know what were the inferior measures of the President in regard to England. If such were the case, the Secretary of Mr. Jefferson was to be fully upon that head, and immediately after the decision was taken, I cannot otherwise account why your letters have not reached me.

I am of opinion that, if a timely and suitable attempt be made to engage the aid of this Government in support of our claims upon England, it may be accomplished, and upon fair and honorable terms. But, under existing circumstances, peculiar and extraordinary care becomes necessary in the arrangement to be adopted; otherwise the attempt will fail, and possess the confidence of this Government, or it will not support it: for no Government will support a negotiation it suspects will terminate in a treaty injurious to itself. For this purpose, then, the person to whom we commit the trust should possess the confidence of this Government, and, in my opinion, the negotiation should be carried on at the place where the French negotiation is carried on, whether at Basel, at whither latter place, it is reported Mr. Eden has lately presented himself; the same person who was not long since at Dapce for an exchange of prisoners as it was said. On the contrary, suppose any person were sent direct to England on this business, what would be its effect here? It is admitted that such a person, when he arrives, will have a considerable influence to our great advantage, but this influence is in the hands of the people. But the moment must be seized, otherwise the prospect diminishes, and every day becomes more remote: for when a coolness, which has once taken place, is suffered to remain for any length of time, after the cause which gave birth to it ceases, that circumstance becomes a new motive for the public, and which, especially if afterwards increased by mutual flights, often ends in mutual enmity. In addition to which it may be observed that, if such aid is wished from France, the state of the war is such as to require, on our part, dispatch; for it is always presumable, when its substantial objects are secured on the one side, and the hope of gain, in a great measure, abandoned on the other, as will be the case, that is not very distant.

I am still of opinion that, if a timely and suitable attempt be made to engage the aid of this Government in support of our claims upon England, it may be accomplished, and upon fair and honorable terms. FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The state of the war is the same as when I wrote you last. Pichegru is still on this side of the Rhine, and the pressure upon Italy is less forcible since than it was before the peace with Spain; a circumstance which gives cause to suspect that negotiations, promising a favorable issue, are depending with the Powers in that quarter. A similar consideration may likewise apply to the intentions of the Porte against Egypt. In both cases, several of its members separately, are negotiating for peace with this republic; of which latter fact we have lately seen an example in a treaty with the prince of Hesse Cassel; whereby sixty thousand of his troops, in English pay, are withdrawn from the army of the Emperor.

The treaty which was hereby made, not simply to amend, but absolutely to set aside the former constitution, and introduce a new one in its stead, differing, too, from the former, in many of its great outlines, and especially in the character of its legislative and executive branches, under the circumstances which existed when it was commenced, being at the moment when the trial of Barrere and his associates was depending, and Paris afflicted by famine, was an enterprise, you will admit, of great moment. So far as it was a dangerous one it proves that such danger was encountered from motives of disinterested patriotism, and patriotism and party are, in the constitution which this attempt has produced, inseparable. With the other, it is infinitely preferable to it, and forms, of course, in case it be adopted, a new bulwark in favor of republican Government, it is equally so to conclude that such, likewise, was the object.

The primary assemblies were convened to deliberate on it five days, and this is the fifth; and in those quarters from which the tendency would naturally be expected, it appears that no alteration, or no alteration material, has been made in the great majorities. It was, likewise, submitted to the armies, and by whom it is said to be adopted almost unanimously. In the prospect, therefore, in this respect, before this republic, one circumstance only presents itself which darkens, in any degree, the political horizon. In putting the new constitution in motion, the Convention wished to transfer from its own body two-thirds of its members to the legislative branches of the new Government, and for which a decree was passed. A motive for this was the advantage the republic would gain from keeping in office many of those in whose hands depending negotiations were, and who, in other respects, are acquainted with the actual state of things. There may be, and doubtless are, other motives for this measure, and which will readily occur.

This arrangement is, however, disliked by many, and, particularly, by the inhabitants of this city, by whom it is generally rejected. The presumption is, that a great majority of France will approve the decree, and in which case Paris will yield; but, should the majority prove to be in the other scale, the presumption is equally strong that the decree will yield to the stormy voice of enthusiasm. Many, however, are of a different opinion, and count upon the division that exists upon this point, as the commencement of a counter-revolution. It is well known that the royalists are active, and using their utmost efforts to improve in their favor and it is also believed that England, and some of the coalesced Powers, view with the utmost alarm the probable establishment of a republican form of government in France. But, should this parallel circumstance which turns up whereon to rest a hope in general, however, their calculations upon the fortune of the Revolution have not been verified by events, and I shall be deceived if this is not the case in the present instance. Indeed, all documents and facts satisfy me that the present policy is calculated for this bold exploit, and which is deemed, under the circumstances attending it, among the most brilliant of the war.

P. S. Respecting Algiers I will write you in my next.

Since writing the above, it is announced that Jourdan, who commands the army of the Sambre and Meuse, has crossed the Rhine at the head of about fifty thousand men, and in the face of about forty thousand, well posted and strongly fortified, on the opposite shore. It is also said that he attacked and took by storm, immediately after wards, the city and castle of St. cloud, this application is made for this bold exploit, and which is deemed, under the circumstances attending it, among the most brilliant of the war.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 4, 1795.

Sir,

I herewith enclose you extracts from several letters from Mr. Cathalan, our consul at Marseilles, and by which it appears the government of the Republic has not permitted the arrival of the Jean de Dry, of the committee of public safety, who is charged with the American affairs, and by whom I am informed that intelligence is received from their consuls at Algiers; so that the verity of this report cannot be doubted. By these extracts, as by the communications of the consuls to me, as I am advised, it is to be inferred that the movements of Mr. H. Humphreys, our minister, were not a mere application in behalf of the friends of America, as the aid of this republic was not extended to us in that negotiation. From what cause this proceeded, if such is the fact, I cannot at present divine; but presume it will be fully explained to you by Colonel Humphreys, from Lisbon; where he doubtless is before this, having left Paris in return there, three weeks since. It is, however, necessary for you to state to you what took place here in that respect, in behalf of Colonel Humphreys’ arrival, prior to the receipt of the above intelligence; as likewise what has been since done in consequence of that intelligence.

I was informed by Colonel Humphreys, upon his return, that you wished to obtain the aid of this Government in support of our relations with the Barbian Powers; for which purpose, indeed, he had come, and that you wished me to ask for it, in case I thought it attainable. From particular considerations, and which will occur to you, I felt some embarrassment in making an application for aid of any kind at the present juncture; but as I was persuaded you had weighed them, and deemed them no obstacle, and knew that the object was equally pressing by interests and by means of the Committee of Public Safety, I brought this matter to my proposer, who stated that it was not the aid of funds that we wanted, but simply the aid of amicable mediation and interference of this Government, and which was promised by our treaty of alliance, but never performed. Colonel Humphreys and myself agreed, that, as credit for the service was to be a principal motive, on the part of France, for embarking in it, it would be expedient on our part to make our arrangements such, as to give full force to that motive; since thereby she would engage in it with greater zeal, and, in consequence, with proportionably greater effect. It readily occurred, that the more direct our measures were, from this quarter, and the more united and harmonious our councils were, in this respect, with the American, this Government would, in confidence, and without, of course, the better our prospect of success. Besides, to give full effect to the influence of France in the councils of the Dey, and thereby obtain a peace at the cheapest rate, it appeared advisable that our agent should be clothed with a French passport, and if possible be a French citizen, and even appear to be an agent of the French Government, exhibiting great zeal, and chiefly from motives of humanity, in regard to our prisoners, whereby we should avoid inculcating any wealth of our part (for wealth and imbecility are with them strong temptations for war) and which would be more咫尺 with the long periods of our resident at that Republic. If, however, this Government, I left the mode or manner of the negotiation open for subsequent and less formal discussion; seeking, in that step, a decision only upon the first point of aid, and which I was explicitly promised by the committee and commission.

I soon found, however, on touching on the other part, the execution, that our anticipation was correct, and that it was expected our agent would depart hence by the route of Marseilles, shunning the countries with which this
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, October 29, 1795.

Sir: The breach which I lately intimated to you had taken place between several of the sections of this city and the Convention, respecting two decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, and whose object was to transfer from the Convention so many of its members as would constitute two-thirds of the legislature of the new government, continued daily to widen, afterwards, till at length all hope of amicable compromise was gone. A final appeal, therefore, was made to arms, and which took place on the 5th instant (13th Vendémiaire) and in which the Convention prevailed. The details of this contest, though very interesting, are not lengthy. In the morning of the 5th, a force was marshalled out by the revolting sections upon their respective parishes, in concert, and under officers already engaged, and who led it on by different avenues towards the national palace, so that by four in the evening the Convention was nearly invested on every side. Within the garden of the Théatres, and around the national palace, the French nation, in the presence of the Convention, deposited their arms, which were to be received, and with cannon to guard the several avenues by which approaches might be made. The members remained within the hall, prepared to await the issue of the day. The disposition, therefore, was that of besiegers against besieged, and who, in the opinion of the Convention, were the aggressors, for, on that of the Convention, taking the whole together, there were not more than six thousand; whilst on the side of the assailants, the active combatants were about four thousand, and a still greater body in arms, which was supposed to be on the same side, or at least neutral. The convention, too, of the parties, bespeaks a strong sympathy with their respective situations; that of those without, exhibited an air of cheerfulness and alacrity, and which nothing but the confidence of success could inspire, whilst that of those within was depressed and melancholy. The action commenced a little after five in the evening by the advance of the troops of the sections, and ended about ten by their retreat. Wherever they approached, they were repulsed by heavy charges of artillery and musketry, which ranged and cleared the streets of their columns as soon as they advanced. However, in the contest which ensued between the Convention and the enemy, the disposition of the troops who were presented at the corners of streets, or when advancing by the head of the column only, and by the time and nature of the action, which was by intervals, I cannot think that more than five hundred were killed and wounded on both sides, though some of the reports make it as many thousands. It was generally understood by the assailants, that little or no opposition would be made, and that two of the principal sections, in particular, were on their side, and that they would so declare themselves when the crisis approached. But in this they were mistaken: for all those troops behaved with great bravery and intrepidity, acquiring themselves as they had done before on the Rhine, having been drawn from the army of the North. Indeed, the probability is, the report was only circulatd to inspire the troops of the sections with confidence, and to produce a suitable impression on the citizens of Paris in general. Many circumstances occurred, in the course of the commotion, to countenance this impression. It was strenuously resisted at first, but when it was abandoned, or feebly supported after the first onset, and repulse, which immediately followed; and after which, it was sustained principally by those who were really and truly the parties to it: for as the great bulk of those who were in the ranks ought not to be considered. This opinion is likewise countenanced by a train of circumstances. It was a measure in motion, to which an immediate force was necessary. The troops of the Convention kept their ground all night, being unwilling to press as far as they might have done the advantage gained, since it appeared that, by such pressure, they might stay more of their countrymen, but not gain the point. On the 12th, however, the order was given that the darkness of the night or other circumstances favored, till finally none were left, except those who were not properly of that description. By the morrow every thing was tranquil as if nothing had passed. At the entrance of every street you saw the pavements taken up, and wagons and other impediments obstructing the passage; but not a sound was heard, and the troops remained those of the 12th, which appeared to be the same. Lepeltier, consisting of a few hundred only, and which had in part retired, and was retiring to its commune as a place of retreat, rather than of defence. But now the scene began to change, and exhibit to view precisely the reverse of what was seen the day before—the besieged becoming the besiegers: for by this time the troops of the Convention had enabled themselves to gain possession of the town. Formerly on the great epoch of the 9th Thermidor, and of Berruyer, who made regular approaches, and by different routes, till finally this corps was completely surrounded. A peremptory summons was then sent to it to surrender, and General Menou, who drew the bitter after he had surrounded it, was, degraded, with the command transferred to Barras. On the 13th, the catastrophe took place, and ended as I have already stated.
That the party in question meant to subvert the Revolution, and restore the ancient monarchy, and that the destruction of the former and the establishment of the latter was the design of which they formed a the main, is not only certain, but the manner in which they intended to accomplish it, cannot be doubted. A slight attention only to the above facts sufficiently demonstrates the truth of this assertion in all its parts. Even in the primary assemblies a ground was taken incompatible with the present system. Some free latitude, it is true, the people have a right to take in those assemblies; however limited or special they may be, if the object is to be accomplished, it is impossible to take too ample. But in an assembly, acting in harmony with the electoral corps, in contempt of the law, and in defiance of the Convention, the case was altered. From that moment rebellion was announced in form, and the sword of civil war was completely unshaped. The Convention survived, or without a counter-revolution, otherwise than by reducing the revolts to orders to order. Fortunate it is even, that to this extent, all bad the thing has since progressed as the friends of the Revolution have wished. The revolted sections were immediately afterwards disarmed, and without opposition, and the electoral corps is now legally convened, (those of it who have not already done so,) (with a short order) and with a disposition to be more observant of the decrees, and accommodating to the existing Government.

But, if this party had succeeded in its attack upon the Convention, what would have followed? Would it likewise have succeeded in the other object, to which this was only a step? A conjectural answer can only be given to a question of such magnitude. The impression was formed that the issue would have been the same. It is said, and with truth, that in case the attack succeeded, it was intended the electoral corps should immediately assemble, and place itself, in some measure, at the head of France. The overthrow of the revolution without a government or constitution; and in which case, this corps, being a legal one, and at the head of this great city, would have had stronger pretensions to the public attention, than any whatever. It was, however, to be presumed, that it would have assumed the reins of government; but it would doubtless have undertaken to admonish, and the probability is, that, in such a state of things, its admonition would have been regarded. With its view, it is believed that the crisis was brought on, at the precise point of time, before the meeting of the electoral assemblies, to admit, in the interval, the communication of the event (in case it were prearranged) to all France, without allowing to the people sufficient time to recover from the dismay and confusion into which they would be thereby thrown. In such a state of things, this corps must have immediately triumphed, and, for the purpose of being in a condition to accomplish it really would be, at least to that stage, by a considerable portion. At the head of this corps was already placed the old ci-devant Duke of Nivernois—a man not without some literary merit, and whose character had been so free from errors, though it seemed to have been somewhat corrupted, and whom, in 1792, the Convention called the reign of Robespierre, a fit subject for the guillotine, yet be survived that reign, and received his life as a boon from those who were now threatened with destruction. It was said he declined the presidency; but it is also believed that his modest disqualification was more the effect of an accurate calculation of chances in the great game that was played. It was the lowest ambitious of all the members, and the majority of the corps, many of whom were likewise ci-devant nobles, was believed to be of the same principles. The nation would therefore have beheld, on the one side, the Convention overthrown, perhaps massacred, and whose members were, in place of it, to form a new assembly; and, on the other side, the new and powerful government, at its head, and which it would, of course, decide preferably of opposite political principles; the latter advanced, the opposite of which was the overthrow of the revolution. All this would, in fact, have been the case, had the nation, when they heard that a king was proclaimed, and would have looked back with horror at the scene through which they had passed.

By this time, too, some of the armies would have been advanced towards Paris, and which would most probably have little to do: for I am persuaded that, as soon as the citizens recovered from the extravaganza into which they had been betrayed, they would be among the first to fall upon their betrayers. The had the second been adopted, it is probable it would have secured the elections in favor of the royalists; the decrees would of course have been declared, and the situation of the people would have been much better seen by the people, and, being shown, half the danger would have been provided against. In the memory of those who were friendly to the Revolution, and the catalog of its friends must be a long one, counting those only whose fathers and sons were slaughtered in its defence on the frontiers, the destruction of the Convention, under whose banners they had bled, would form a moral cause would hang heavy on the shoulders of the subsequent administration. The manner of the surcharge, though in form free, would be demed an usurpation, and the slightest deviation afterwards become a signal for revolt. If they used their power with violence, the same effect would be produced as it liking were immediately proclaimed; and if they used it with moderation, they might perhaps e new the calamities of another crisis; and whilst away in office the time allotted by the constitution, be enabled, in the interim, so far to efface the memory of what was passed, as to secure themselves afterwards a retreat which would exempt them from punishments but in neither case would they be able to restore the ancient monarchy. You have now heard of the importance of that which I have been talking of. But, before you go to the citizens of Paris are so likewise; and that the farmers, or cultivators in general, if not decidedly in favor of the Revolution, though in my opinion they are, are at least not against it; and which belief, though erroneous, is the real cause of all the disorder, confusion, and disturbance which is proceeding in the kingdom. But you will ask, if Paris is on the side of the Revolution, how happened that such a force was formed after the Convention, whilst so small a one was marshalled on its side? Let us first establish facts and then the Paris consists of forty-eight sections, and of which eight only were actually in arms against the Convention there for it, and the others neutral. Of those, too, who were sent by the eight sections, it is probable, from the peremptory manner of their retreat, and the ease with which they were afterwards disarmed, as likewise by their uniform declarations at the time and since, that the greater number did not expect to be led against the Convention or, if they were, they were to have been led to one section, and particularly that of Lepelletier, is certain. But that this was not the case with many is probable. It is well known that the inhabitants of Paris, in general, wished to get rid of their present deputies, and for reasons heretofore explained. The opposition to the decrees, therefore, may have been formed for, and with the greater propriety, because it is certain they were opposed, and even by the royals, upon republican principles, the unilateral right of suffrage, &c, and by which an impression was made in the primary assemblies upon the audience, and thence gradually extended throughout the city. In the primary assemblies, too, every person was allowed to speak; and it happened that, among the royalists, there were some good speakers, and who, by taking popular ground, en grossed for the time the public attention; by means thereof they were enabled to practise more extensively on the credulity of the less enlightened of their countrymen than they were aware of. It often happens, when a collision takes place between friends, and even upon a trivial cause, one act of irritation begets another, till finally the particular ingredient which originally rendered the transaction disputable, is lost sight of, and the parties come to quarrel over the ignorant, and seduce them into error, especially when it is known that the latter already wished a change; that they thought they had a right to make it and of which right they could not be deprived, without the sacrifice of their liberty, in whose cause they had already so long contended, and so greatly suffered.

But I am digressing. What was the cause, then, by which the papers of the Convention, the Fratelles, were on opposite sides, should now shift their ground, so as that those who then supported the Convention should now be against it, and those who opposed should now be for it? Taking the Convention as the standard, it remains only in any case to explain, why these matters were left to the Harvey and arguments of explanation. No one will ask such a party supports the Convention, because there can be no motive for such an action. In some cases, a party, yielding such support, may have less honorable motives for it than another party had. I think I have seen such myself. But in no case can the object be a counter-revolutionary one; because, in this case, already it had been done in the regular way. I do not do it: for I have already explained what I deemed in general the cause of the aberration of the sections upon the present occasion, as I did upon the former one; that of the faubourg of St. Antoine, and whose present conduct warrants the opinion then given upon that event. In so many of the electoral forces it was a mere matter of the disaffected were chosen into the electoral corps as to give the royalists a preponderance there? How could a people, attached to the Revolution, commit the care of it to those who were its foes, especially such as, by their station and character, were universally known to be such? This touches a subject of great importance; and, on this occasion, however, I will not dwell upon the subject, as the present view is the abuse of liberty, and in which case it will present to view a scene of horror, in some respects perhaps not less frightful than that which was exhibited under the reign of terror. Behind the curtain, as it were, for it has made but little noise in several of the departments, the terrible scourge of terror has shifted hands, and lately been wielded by the royalists, who, beginning with the salabon and perhaps wicked agents of the former reign, had persecuted and murdered many of the soundest patriots and best of men. To such a height had this evil risen, and so general was the imputation of terrorism that, in certain quarters, the patriots in general were not only discouraged, but, in a great measure, compelled to suffer such punishments as they sought to know, and who merit belief, they that were made to suffer. I have already observed, I have been misinformed, and in point of number the patriots, and even where the preponderance, in the case of the French for not in favor, none attended the primary assemblies; and that, in others, a few only attended, and who took no part in the proceedings. This, therefore, will account why the royalists took the lead in those assemblies, and why so many of them, by the electoral forces,

But by what strange vicissitude of affairs was this effect produced? How could it happen under an administration unfriendly to royalty? In truth the explanation is distinctly marked by preceding events, and has been in part unfolded in preceding communications. Terrorism, or what was then called so, the persecution of the royalists, had gone to such a length that it became indispensably necessary to end it. To this object, therefore, the force of the Government was directed, and with effect: for it was accomplished. But, in striking at terrorism, perhaps by the unguarded manner of the blow; perhaps by those consequences which were inseparable from such vibrations, and which I deem the likely one, contrary to the principle which was given, for the day the excess of the passion for liberty, but it was counterenacted by those in office, as necessary, in their judgment, to bring about the Revolution; nor were its acts displayed in private assassinations. On the contrary, they were sanctified by public judgments and public executions. The most culpable, therefore, were those who escaped for it. Therefore, they were the only object of the general policy, and even where the excess was criminal, the punishment was otherwise. At that point, therefore, which discriminated between the vicious extravagancies of the moment, and the spirit of patriotism itself, should the scale have been suspended; and there, by the law, it was suspended; for I do not recollect any act of the Convention which passed beyond it. Special outrages were, it is true, special. But however great in those respects, and, therefore, it is known that the law was at that point the offence. But so nice was the subject upon which they had to act, and so delicate is the nerve of human sensibility, that it was impossible for the Government, under existing circumstances, to moderate its rigor towards the royalists, without ceasing in a certain degree, encouragement to royalty. In this, therefore, it is to be presumed the last event will produce a beneficial effect: for, as the views of the royalists were completely unmasked, and defeated, and which were always denied to exist, until they were thus unmasked, it cannot otherwise than tend to open the eyes of the community in that respect, and in the degree to repress the arrogant spirit of royalty. To your judgment, and that of the country, and in respect to the event, I have been, and I am persuaded will be what it may, I shall find that the same amicable and passionate counsels still prevail towards us that have been shown for some time past. To inculcate which disposition, not only by the documents and lights derived from you, but by such others as my immediate experience, and my own too who have judgment, have been, and be assured will continue to be, equally the object of my earliest wishes, and undeviating efforts.

P. S. As the vessel by which this will be forwarded will not sail until a gentleman, who now here, arrives at Haslenger, and which number will be enough with me to land him on the 1st of May, I shall leave him to take the care of the execution of this letter. On the day after to-morrow, the new Government is to convene, and the prospect is now favorable that it will then convene, and precisely upon the ground stated in the preceding letter. Some symptoms were latterly seen which gave cause for apprehension that the expiring moments of the Convention would be momentous, and of an agitated and convulsive description. Distance, however, proceeding from causes connected with the late movement; but happily these are over, without producing any serious effect. A commission of five was appointed to make a supplemental report concerning this matter, and it was expected by many it would end in a proprietary and connected manner. A part of the instructions given to this commission were contrived by the royalists, and probably, also, in the arrestation of several deputies; but that commission has freed every one from uneasiness on that account, by a report just made; and which proposes only some new provisions for the trial of offenders in that movement, and others in several of the departments, who have committed atrocities of various kinds, in the present state of this country, and the events of the last few weeks, which are not connected, not only with the emigrants abroad, but with the surrounding Powers, by whom the necessary means are furnished for the purpose. But yet it seems as if the Convention would retain its strength to the last moment of its existence, and transmit its powers unimpaired to its successor. The decrees are to be universally observed, and the legislature, as such. These are, in general, re-elected; these are to elect the others, so as to make up the two-thirds of the new Government.
Lately, Jourdan received a check on the other side of the Rhine, and which occasioned his falling back to the Rhine upon which river both his and the French forces were posted. The cause of this is not distinctly known; but certain it is, that the deputy of the military section of the committee of public safety has been since arrested, upon a suspicion of treachery; as are three others, upon a charge of treasonable correspondence with their enemies; but with what propriety I do not pretend to determine. It is worthy of remark, that it was known in England and in Basle, before it happened, that there would be a movement here at the time it happened; at which time, too, the Count d'Artois landed from England upon the Isle of Dieu, near the French coast, opposite the Vendée, where he still is.

A report was yesterday made to the Convention, of an important advantage gained in a rancorous in the Mediterranean, in which the French took a ship of the line and damaged greatly two others; and likewise took fourteen merchant ships, richly laden, and estimated at an enormous sum. Two other advantages in other quarters are spoken of, still more signal than this, but not by authority.

Moneron is returned; but whether by order of the French Government, (as I suspect, and in consequence of the fortunate issue of the late movement) or the failure of his mission, be it what it might, is uncertain. Be assured, if Mr. Jay's treaty is ratified, it will excite great discontent here. Of this, however, I shall be able to speak with more certainty after the new Government is organized.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 5, 1795.

Sir: On the 27th ultimo the Convention ended its career, by declaring that its powers ceased; and immediately afterwards the installation of the new Government began in the same hall, by a verification of the powers of its deputies, and their distribution into two branches, according to the mode prescribed in the constitution; and which was completed in that and the succeeding day. It was found upon inspection, that the decrees heretofore noticed were universally obeyed, and that, of the two-thirds of its legislative branches who were to be taken from among the members of the Convention elected by the departments, so that the duty imposed upon those who were elected, of supplying the deficiency by their own suffrage, became proportionately more easy and less objectionable. This, therefore, was immediately executed by ballot; and, after which, the interior organization of each branch followed, and which took up a day or two only; then the members of the directory, or executive, were chosen, and which was done on the 21st ultimo, and whereby the new Government was completely established.

When I observe that the scene, which was exhibited upon this great occasion, resembled, in many respects, what we see daily acted on our side of the Atlantic, in our National and State Assemblies, you will have a better idea of the tranquillity which reigned throughout, than I can otherwise describe. Nor shall I be accused of an unbecoming partiality, if I draw, from the increasing similitude in their and our political institutions, which this constitution and other proceedings furnish, the most favorable hopes of the future prosperity and welfare of this republic.

The adoption of a new constitution, founded upon the equality of human rights, with its legislative powers distributed into two branches, and other improvements in the executive and judiciary departments, though still perhaps imperfect, yet certainly far beyond what past experiments here gave reason to expect, is an event of great importance, not only to France, but perhaps to mankind in general. Its complete inauguration, too, assures us that its merits will be tried; though, indeed, under the existing circumstances of a war with the neighboring Powers, who are interested in its overthrow of a strong party within, incessantly laboring to promote the same object; together with the derangement of the finances and other embarrassments which were inseparable from the difficulties they had to encounter; the experiment ought not to be called a fair one. If, however, it does succeed, and the republican system is preserved here, notwithstanding the various and complicated difficulties which opposed its establishment, and still shakes its foundation, it will certainly furnish a complete refutation of all those arguments which have been, in all ages and nations, urged against the practicability of such a Government, and especially in old countries.

Revelliere, Lepeaux, Rewbell, Sieyes, Le Tournier, and Barras are elected into the directory; and who are all distinguished for their talents and integrity, as likewise their devotion to the Revolution; a circumstance which not only furnishes reasonable ground wherein to estimate the principles of those who choose them, but which will likewise tend essentially to give stability to the Republic itself. I write you at present only to communicate this important event, and will hereafter, as heretofore, keep you regularly advised of what shall appear to me to merit communication.

P. S. Sieyes has declined accepting his seat in the directory, and Carnot is appointed in his stead. Mr. Fauchet is lately arrived, and as he appears to be extremely dissatisfied with Mr. Jay's treaty with Great Britain, and is, apparently, well received by his Government, I doubt not his communications on that head will be attended to.

Mr. Pickering to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 23, 1795.

Sir: The office of Secretary of State is yet vacant. I write now merely to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 30, and 11. You will see an answer to the last has been anticipated, by a long letter from me, dated in September, on the subject of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. By that letter, you will understand that the ideas you have detailed are quite forseen by the Government of the United States.

Your suggestions in regard to Mr. Parish, our consul at Hamburg, have been the subject of a report from Mr. Adams of a request formerly made to him, to inquire into his conduct, and report the same to this Department. Such I understand to be the fact, and that no report has yet been received.

I am, etc.,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 6, 1795.

Sir: I was lately honored with originals and triplicates of your favors of the 12th and 14th of September last.* The duplicates are yet to be received.

By the first of these letters, I learn that the President has ratified the late treaty with England; and by the second, the measures taken to vindicate our territorial rights, that were violated by the captain of a British frigate, in an attempt to seize Mr. Fauchet, the late French minister, within our jurisdiction, on his return home; and to which communications due regard shall be paid, as occasion requires.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

That the treaty was ratified, was a fact well established here, before the receipt of your favor. It was, indeed, generally credited before the arrival of Mr. Fauchet, by whom it was confirmed, and afterwards doubted by none.

As I had no reason to presume, from any communication from your Department, that the contrary would be the case, so I had never calculated on the contrary; nor had I given this Government any reason to calculate on the contrary; having left it to form its own judgment on that point, according to its own lights, so that, in this respect, I have nothing wherewith to reproach myself on the score of discretion.

The effect which this incident produced in the minds of the people, and the course of councils and public discussions, may be traced in many communications, and particular references, and to which I beg to refer you. To these, I have at present nothing material new to add. Symptoms of discontent, it is true, are still seen; but whether they will assume an aspect more unpleasant, I know not. If they do, or any thing occurs of sufficient importance to merit your attention, I will certainly apprise you of it without delay.

You likewise saw, by my former communications, that I understood and acted upon that part of my instructions, which explained the object of Mr. Jay's mission to England, differently from what it appears, by your favor of the 12th of September, and by Mr. Randolph's of the 1st of June preceding, it was intended I should understand and act upon the idea that the object of Mr. Jay's mission was placed in the hands of the French Finance and Commercial Plenipotentiaries, whom, indeed, I am not yet perhaps fully extricated, though I hope and think I am. Upon this head, I have only now to observe, that, as soon as I had reason to believe that Mr. Jay's instructions embraced objects which I had never thought they did not, I protested to the President, and heard, and asked precisely between the Government and myself upon that subject, and to which I with pleasure add, that I have never heard the least intimation on it since. In reviewing this particular trait in my conduct here, you will, I doubt not, do me the justice to observe, that when I made the suggestion alluded to, it was not really in the character of the court (nor was it, indeed, with regard to the actual state of our affairs at the time) I was called on to make it by considerations the most weighty, and which ought not to have been dispensed with; considerations, however, which I now forbear to repeat, having heretofore sufficiently unfolded them.

I have the pleasure to enclose you the report of Mr. Skipwith, upon the subject of the claims of many of our citizens who were heretofore injured by the occurrences of the war, and in consequence entitled to indemnities, and by which you will find that many of those claims are settled, and derive useful information in respect to others.

I likewise send you a letter from Mr. Skipwith, explaining the circumstances that led to the charge exhibited against him in your Department. As Mr. Fenwick has always proved himself to be an useful, indeed a valuable, officer in the station he holds, and as the error imputed to him might be the effect of judgment only, and which I think it was, I have thought I could not better forward your views, or the interest of my country, than by confirming him in the decision of that officer. I think it is my duty to request you to confirm the decision of that officer, and to accompany with you the subject, so that the interval will not be great before I have the decision in question, and which will, of course, be duly executed.

Two days since, Count Carletti, minister from Tuscany, was, in consequence of some offense given him by the Government, ordered to depart from Paris in forty-eight hours, and the bounds of the republic in eight days. It is said the offense consisted in a demand made to visit the daughter of the late King, of whom he spoke in terms of comical consideration, and which was thought to be not only an interference in concerns exclusively their own, but to have thrown some reproach on the French Government. The count, I hear, departs to-night, by way of Marseilles.

Soon after the Government was organized, the minister of foreign affairs announced a day on which the directory would receive the ministers of foreign powers, and who were requested to rendezvous for that purpose at his house, to proceed thence to that of the directorie. We did so, and were presented, without regard to precedence, to that body, and whose president addressed the whole diplomatic corps in a short discourse, the principal object of which was, to assure it of the cordiality with which it was welcomed by the representatives of the French people, which he contrasted with the pride and ceremony of the ancient court, which, he said, was now forever and ever fraternal.

I do not think that latter circumstance merely to contradict the account given of the address by the journalists, and who made a particular speech for the president to each minister.

Manheim has certainly fallen again into the hands of the Austrians, with the garrison; the amount of which is not known, but presumed to be several thousands. But, in Italy, the fortune of the war is on the side of France: for the same day which announced the capture of Manheim, announced likewise a great and decisive victory over the Austrians in the other quarter. The details of the killed and wounded are also not yet accurately known; but it is understood that four or five thousand are taken prisoners, many slain, and the whole army put completely to rout.

Since the organization of the new Government, the character and deportment of all the departments are essentially improved. The legislative corps, in both its branches, exhibits, in the manner of discussion, a spectacle wonderfully imposing in its favor, when compared with what was daily seen in the late Convention. And the executive departments begin to show an energy which grows out of the nice partition of their duties, and the greater responsibility that belongs to each. In truth, the vibration from the system of terror had, by the force of moral causes, gone far, and produced so deep an effect, as to have greatly relaxed the whole machine of Government. It was clear to us that the peace and ceremony of the ancient court, with which, he said, was now forever and ever fraternal.

Mr. Pickney has, I hear, closed his business in Spain to his satisfaction, and is now on his route back, intending to take Paris in his way. I trust this report is, in every respect, well founded; of which, however, you will doubtsless be correctly informed before this reaches you.

P. S. Count Carletti has notified to the French Government that he cannot depart without the consent of his own.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, December 22, 1795.

Six:

Since my last, I was favored with yours of the 9th of October, and a quadruplicate of that of the 12th of September; of which latter, the original and triplicate were before acknowledged.

Since my last, too, I have received a note from the minister of foreign affairs, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Parish, our consular, in Hamburg, in the matter of passports for vessels, and cases of the like kind, in which cases as the English agent; a copy of which note, and of my reply, are herewith forwarded you. I hear, also, that his conduct was more than reproachable being stated by the minister; for that he not only employed the emigrants, but did it in American bottoms, with a view of protecting them under our flag. I am informed, however, that after a long and extended communication, the case was closed, and the minister of foreign affairs, with a view to his personal and public character, not only withdrew his charge, but apologized to the minister of foreign affairs of the British government, in the matter of his having, in the .instance of the English merchant, Mr. Benjamin Jarvis and Thomas Randall, both of New York, the former a respectable merchant, as has been represented to me, and the latter known to the President as captain of artillery in the late war, and lately as vice consul at Canton, in China, have requested me to communicate to them their wish to obtain a place among the consular, in that of the respective ports of France, or other European ports connected with the trade of France; and that I have reason to believe they would, either of them, be happy to accept the appointment in question. In case Mr. Parish is removed, permit me further to suggest the propriety of giving to his successor two commissions; one for Hamburg, and the other for Altona, in the latter of which latter, the greater freedom of its trade; for Hamburg, though in some respects a free and independent city, yet in others it feels... the influence of the Emperor, and is therefore a less eligible port for mercantile transactions, and especially those connected with France.

I sent you, with my last, a report of Mr. Skipwith upon the cases submitted to his care for adjustment with this Government, and shall continue to give him all the aid in my power in those cases which remain unsettled, and apply to you regularly for the progress.

At present, no symptoms of an approaching peace are to be seen, unless, indeed, the most vigorous preparations for the termination of the war may be deemed such, and which sometimes happens. The Directory has called on the Legislature to repair the mischiefs of the Civil Constitution, which was of itself a response raising it to the height of a loan; of which I send you a copy. The greatest possible essentions are making by that body, and which seem to be supported by the Legislature, in putting the armies, the fleets, and the interior, into the best possible order; and so far as I can judge from appearances, these essentions seem to produce the effects that are desired. Mr. Girard does not pretend, with which justification, to see nor to hear any thing that any, not, they command respect. It is said, that Pichegru and Jourdan have lately gained several important advantages over the Austrians, in actions which, though not general, were nearly so; and that, in the result, they have resumed their station before Mayence. The former part of this report is, I believe, to be depended on; the latter wants confirmation.

The conduct of Prince Hohenlohe, who commands the northwestern department of France, during the retreat of the former, and who were stationed there to preserve the line of neutrality in favor of Prussia, it is said, could scarcely be deemed neutral. For the civilities which were shown by him to the Austrians upon that occasion, it is said, he has been rewarded since by some complimentary attention from the Emperor. The Dutch appear apprehensive that the King of Prussia will seize this suitable opportunity, if any offers, to favor the restoration of the Stadholder; and it is possible the conduct of the Prince Hohenlohe, above referred to, may have increased that suspicion, by giving an insight into what might be the views of the Prussian cabinet, in case the retreat had continued; or any great reverse of fortune should hereafter befal the Prussian arms. It is certain, however, that moments of difficulty are always moments of great jealousies; and that sometimes, upon such occasions, suspicion is thrown upon those who do not deserve it.

The Count Carletti, late envoy, &c. from Tuscany, left Paris some four or five days since. He had refused going until he had heard from the Grand Duke and remained, notwithstanding the reiterated orders of the Directory. Finally, however, he was ordered to depart in twenty-four hours, (this was not done before as I stated in my last) with intimation that force would be used to compel him, in case he did not. He still held out, however, the flag of defiance. The twenty-four hours expired, at which moment a comissionary, with a carriage from the Government, waited to receive him; and other words from the Directory, to the Count, to keep him safe beyond the bounds of the republic; which was accordingly done. The diplomatic corps was summoned, by a member either averse to this peremptory mode of proceeding, or friendly to the Count, to interfere with the Directory in his behalf; but seven members of that corps were of opinion, that, although sometimes a demand is made on the Government of a minister who gives offence, to recall him, yet there is no obligation on the Government offended, by the law of nations, to take that course; but that it may take any other, and even upon slight occasions, to rid itself of, more prompt and summary, if it thinks fit; and, in consequence, no step was taken by the diplomatic corps on the subject.

I enclose you, also, a note from the minister of foreign affairs, complaining of the seizure and condemnation of the corvette Cassius; which, he says, is in violation of the treaties between the two republics; and to which I replied, that I would present the subject to your attention; and doubted not I should be enabled to give a satisfactory answer thereon.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, January 20th, 1796.

Some weeks since, the property of William Vans, a citizen of the United States, was attacked by Joseph Sands, another citizen of the said States, in a tribunal of France at Havre, where the cause was sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the superior tribunal of the department of Havre, which, as I believe it is now dependent. As soon as the suit commenced, Mr. Vans applied for my interference; and I had the honor to convene it at the instance of a fellow-citizen, from the tribunals of the country; the cognizance of such controversies being, as he supposed, thereby exclusively vested in the consuls of each nation, within the jurisdiction of the other. I examined attentively the convention, and was of opinion, that the construction insisted on by Mr. Vans was sound; but he had no other right to pursue the case on principle, and not in the form of a parvenu. I accordingly decline any interference in it, till I had your instruction. He continued, however, to press me, saying that if such was the case, it rested in him a right which I ought to secure him the enjoyment of; the deprivation of which, too, in the present instance, would be his ruin: for that the execution of the judgment by the sale of the merchandise attached at Havre, where there was no demand for it, would not only subject him to a severe loss, but that he was likewise sued for the same sum in America, and where judgment would probably, likewise, be rendered against him. Finally, therefore, I did apply in his behalf, by a letter to the minister of foreign relations, of which I send you a copy, explaining my idea of the import of the treaty in the case in question; and requesting that the Executive (so far as depended on that branch, and provided it concurred with me in opinion) might cause the same to be executed; and to which I have yet received no answer, though I am assured verbally, that the directory concurs with me in the construction; and that a correspondent: intimation thereon will be given by the minister of justice, to the extent where the suit now is; with whom it will probably be decisive. If in this case that you may apprise me how it is the wish of the President I should act in cases of the kind in future, and even in the present one, if not finally settled before I hear from you; and which may probably happen. If it is wished that such construction should be given of the treaty, I doubt such a principle of practice will be agreeable to this Government; but if the contrary is preferred, you will, I presume, see the necessity of prescribing, by the suitable authority, how the consular courts are to be held, how their process is to be executed, and appeals conducted.

As connected with this property, permit me to call your attention to another, upon which I likewise wish to be instructed. For the port of Havre there are at present two consuls, or rather a consul and a vice consul; both of whom, Mr. Cutting and Mr. Lamotte, are recognized by this Government. Was it intended the latter commission shall still continue, it would seem it should exist, at least, till the consul shall continue, if not being domiciliary, till the consul is present? I wish to know in what light I am to consider these appointments, since thereby I shall likewise know to whom I am to look for the performance of the consular duties of this port.*

A third one of the same kind occurs, and which I think proper to mention to you. Sometime since, Mr. Pictaiu was sent to the court of France, with several other appointments, and some thing similar, which appoinm, and on which I have had your several considerations, growing out of his character as a British subject, and the actual state of things here; which made it inexpedient to demand his recognition of this Government, until after they were weighed, and I, in consequence, was not mentioned in the list at Paris, I believe, of May 17th last, and to which, as yet, I have received no answer. As Mr. Pictaiu probably expects to hear from me on this topic, I shall thank you for information of what I am to say to him, and how I am to act in that respect.

* Both of these gentlemen are men of merit and great respectability. I wished only the principle settled.
The collection of the forced loan continues, and will, I think, succeed. But what its product will be is a point upon which there is a diversity of opinion. Some think it will fall short of the sum at which it was estimated, whilst others carry it much beyond that estimation. Certain, however, it is, that by means thereof the embarrassments of the Realm are greatly increased, and the prospect of a more complete system of finances, which subject is now under consideration of the council of five hundred.

About the twentieth of December last, a truce was asked by the Austrian Generals Wurmser and Clairfait, of Pichegru and Jourdan, for three months, and granted, subject to the will of the directorate, by whom, it is said, it was allowed for only one report, at first circulated, that it was wholly rejected, being without foundation. Whether it will be prolonged, admitting the term as stated to be correct, is unknown, as likewise is the motive of Austria in asking, or of France in granting it. The presumption is, it was to try the experiment of negotiation in the interest; and such is the report. And it is likewise presumable, that such an experiment was made or is now making; but, from what I can learn, there is little prospect of its producing a peace. It will be difficult to part Austria from England, whilst the latter supplies the former with money to carry on the war, and which she will probably continue to do, whilst she carries it on herself. The present prospect, therefore, is, that Europe is destined to sustain the waste and havoc of another campaign, for superior as England at sea, and France in the field. The Constitution of the Cape of Good Hope, it is not probable, if she escapes an internal commotion, the symptoms of which have diminished of late, that she will restore every thing on her part, and leave France in possession of the Belgic, and other provinces of Holland. A peace, therefore, such as England will make any sacrifice in favor of the Emperor; whether, in short, she would agree to restore the possessions taken by her from France and Holland, as a consideration for the restoration of the Belgic to the Emperor. It is even added, that intimations have been made by her, that if France will leave her in possession of her conquests from Holland, she will restore every thing taken from France, and leave her in possession of St. Domingo and the Belgic. If this be true, and it be credited by the Emperor, it will certainly tend to weaken, and perhaps absolutely to dissolve the connexion between England and Austria.

I communicated to you, in two preceding letters, the application of Count Carlotti, minister from Tuscany, for permission to visit the unfortunate young princess, &c. and the displeasure which that demand gave to the directorate, who suspended his powers immediately, ordered him to leave the republic forthwith, and, finally, sent him, by force, beyond its limits. It was apprehended, by many, that this peremptory mode of proceeding would give offence to the Grand Duke; the contrary, however, was the case; for, as soon as he heard of the transaction, he despatched another envoy to the directorate, to dissavow the demand of Carlotti, and declare his respect for the French Government, and such was the solicitude of his hasty departure, that he actually departed without the ordinary credentials, bearing simply a letter of introduction from the Grand Duke himself. Thus, therefore, this business has arrived at having any injurious effect on the French republic, whilst it is a proof of the energy of its councils, and of its decision upon the delicate subject to which it refers.

On the 21st instant, being the anniversary of the execution of the late King, the members of the legislative corps of the directorate, and all public officers, took a new and solemn oath to support it, and, or, rather, of hatred to royalty. The directorate gave, on the same day, what is called a fête in the champ de Mars, where an amphitheatre was erected, and from whence the President, surrounded by the other members, and all the ministers of the Government, delivered an oration suited to the occasion, to a numerous audience. It seems to be the policy of the existing Government to revive in the mind of the people in favor of the republic, and of the revolutions and measures of this kind are certainly well calculated to produce that effect.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have heard, through a channel that merits confidence, that the term of the truce is prolonged, and which strengthens what I intimated above, that a negotiation is depending with Austria. The recent departure, too, of one of the Dutch ministers for Holland, after a conference with the directorate, and which took place without the truce was, probably, prolonged, is a circumstance which I think proper to communicate, since it gives cause to suspect, if a negotiation is depending, it treats for a general, and not a partial peace.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, February 16th, 1796.

I think it my duty to state to you, and without delay, a communication made me yesterday by the minister of foreign affairs of Veire, concerning the interest of several of our countrymen, occasioned by the protest, at Hamburg, of bills given them for supplies rendered the Government, and to request his aid with the directorate to obtain them relief. This application was intended to harmonise with one that was making informally by our consul general, with the directorate, and which was arranged, in order to present the demands of the claimants before the Government, and to procure the same equitable measure, without wounding its feelings. But, before I entered on this subject, my attention was called to another, more important, and upon which he seemed pleased with the opportunity of addressing me. He observed that the directorate had, at length, made application to repair to the United States, to declare to our Government the dissatisfaction between the two Governments, ceasing to exist from the moment the treaty was ratified, and had, or should, appoint an envoy extraordinary to attend and represent the same to our Government; that the person in view was known and esteemed in our country, and who would be specially commissioned on this business, and whose commission would expire with it; that Mr. Adet had asked and obtained his recall, but did not say whether any other minister would be appointed in his stead for the present, though, as connected with Adet's resignation, it is reported that Maret, lately returned from captivity in Austria, is to succeed him. The minister added some general observations on the treaty, tending to show that it was considered as throwing us into the scale of the coalition powers, observing that he should hand me an official note on this subject, being ordered so to do by the directorate. As no specific objection was stated, I could make no specific reply. I expressed to him, however, my astonishment and concern at the measure spoken of, and inculcated, in the short time I remained with him, (for he was upon the point of going out) the propriety of candor in the discussion of the treaty, in its several parts, and the benefit of in open in all transactions with us, since we were certainly their best friends. To this he made no answer, and whereupon I left him. I have since heard nothing from him on the subject. I mean to see him, however, to-day, and, in case he permits me to act on the communication as an official one, to demand an audience of the directorate, to endeavor to divert it, or, if possible, from the measure contemplated of which, and of the business generally, I will write you again in a day or two.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, February 20th, 1796.

Sr.

Immediately after my last, of the 16th of February, was concluded, I demanded, and had a conference with the minister of foreign affairs, upon the communication given in that letter.

I represented to him that the information he had given me, of the intention of the directorate to appoint an envoy extraordinary to repair to the United States, to declare to our Government the dissatisfaction between the two Governments, in respect to our treaty with Great Britain, had penetrated me with the deepest concern, because I feared, from a measure so marked and conspicuous, the most serious ill consequences, both to them and to us. I stated to him that such a mission was calculated to make an impression in America, and throughout the world; not only that they were dissatisfied with us, but, that even the issue of war and peace was suspended on the issue of the mission; that their and our enemies would rejoice at the event, whilst theirs and our friends would behold the spectacle with horror:
that the mission itself would place both republics in a new dilemma, and, from which, they could not both well extricate themselves with honor; that something was due, in the opinion of the world, to the character of the mission—its success must be brilliant, or the public would be disappointed, and this might induce them to insist on terms they would not otherwise have thought of, and which would increase their mutual embarrassments; that, as soon as the mission was known to foreign powers, they would commence their intrigues to make it the means of separating us; that all were interested in our separation, not in our union; and, that our separation was an evil to be deprecated by France, and the occasion itself might diminish the number of their friends. Now it seemed to me that we had never confided in the friendship of any power but in that of France, so I was satisfied they had no real friend excep-America; that republics could never count upon the friendship of monarchies; if they did count upon it, they would always be deceived. Peace there might be, but peace and friendship did not always mean the same thing.

I observed further, that France had gained credit by her late conduct towards us. For whilst England had seized our vessels, and harassed our trade, she had pursued an opposite, and more magnanimous policy; and which had produced, and would continue to produce, a correspondent effect, by increasing our resentment against England, and attachment to France. But as soon as the latter should assume an hostile or menacing deportment within us, would this motive diminish, and the argument it furnished lose its force? That by this, however, I did not mean to understand, as admitting the well founded complaints, if any, admitted, or were thought to exist, should be withheld; on the contrary, I was of opinion, they should be brought forward, as well to obtain redress where it was wished, and could be given, as to make known, in a frank and friendly manner, the sentiments which each entertained of the conduct of the other, in cases that were interesting to it. That on my part, I was always ready to enter into such explanations, when required, and would do it in the present instance with pleasure; since, by being possessed of our view of the subject, they would be better able to decide, whether the complaint was well or ill founded, and of course how far it merited to be considered in that light.
In short, I used every argument that occurred, to divert the Government from the measure proposed, assuring him, that in my own case, I was always ready to enter into such explanations, when required, and would do it in the present instance with pleasure; since, by being possessed of our view of the subject, they would be better able to decide, whether the complaint was well or ill founded, and of course how far it merited to be considered in that light.

The minister replied, that France had much cause of complaint against us, independently of our treaty with England, but that, by this treaty, ours with them was annulled. That the directory considered their conduct, in these respects, as absolutely unfriendly to them, and, under which impression, that it was their duty so to represent it to us: that the mode which was proposed of making such representation had been deemed mild and respectful, and as such ought not to give offence. He admitted, however, that the objections I had stated against it were strong and weighty with him, and that he would immediately make them known to the directory, and by whom, he doubted not, all suitable attention would be paid to them. Since this I have not seen him, but propose seeing him again, either to-day or to-morrow, on this subject; and, after which, I will immediately apprise you of the state in which it may be.

This affair has given me great concern, because it opens a new era upon us; and whose consequences, unless the measure itself be prevented, may be of a very serious kind. I shall do every thing in my power to prevent it, and, in any event, communicate to you, and with the utmost dispatch, every incident that turns up connected with it.

So far, my object has been to break the measure in question; and after which, if effected, I shall most probably be called on for explanations of the treaty complained of; and, in which case, I shall of course avail myself, in the best manner possible, of those communications which have been heretofore received from your Department.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, March 5, 1796.

Being informed by you that the executive directory considers the late treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain as derogating, in some respects, from the treaties of alliance and commerce subsisting between the two republics, and that your minister, as a plenipotentiary for the United States, was invited to represent the same to our Government, I have thought it my duty to ask an audience of the executive directory upon that subject, not doubting that the explanations I shall be able to give thereon will make on that body an impression sufficiently satisfactory to merit all its attention. Permit me, therefore, to request, citizen minister, that you will communicate to me, as soon as possible, the memos from him the executive directory upon that subject, at such time as may be most convenient for that body to receive me.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 17th Ventose, (March 7th, 1796) 4th year of the republic.

I have the honor to inform you, citizen, that the executive directory will receive you to-morrow, the 18th instant, at ten in the morning.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 10th, 1796.

I informed you, in my two last of the 16th and 20th ultimo, of a communication made by me to the minister of foreign affairs, that the directoire had resolved to send an envoy extraordinary to the United States, to remonstrate against our late treaty with England, and of my efforts to prevent it; and I have now the pleasure to add that I have reason to believe those efforts have been successful, the minister having assured me, in a late conference, that the directoire was disposed to accommodate in this respect, and to make its representations, on that subject, through the ordinary channel. He repeated, however, upon this occasion, in terms equally strong with those he had used before, the solemn obligations he imposed on himself, and which, he said, he would answer to the director; and that the injury done to France by that treaty, and upon which explanations were expected, and would be sought.

I asked him what were his objections to the treaty, to which he replied, as before, in general, rather than in precise terms. He expressed himself as opposed to the treaty in general, as he was not satisfied with the conduct of the United States in the present war, that it was not admitted by our Government, that any, the slightest, deviation was from the principles of our treaties with this republic; nor ought it to be presumed, until it was shown that such was the case, especially as I had before informed him, and now repeated my willingness to discuss that point, whenever he thought it.
He intimated that I should certainly hear from him on the subject, and in time to receive a reply, and attentive to any observations I chose to make on it, but being now before the directory, he could not well enter on it in the manner I proposed, until he had the further orders of that body in that respect. Thus, therefore, the matter now stands, and I have only to repeat to you my assurance that I shall continue to pay to it all the attention it deservedly merits.
The state of affairs here has not varied essentially of late, either in the internal or in the external relations of the republic. The forced loan was less productive than it was expected to be, and of course the relief it gives must be considered as partial, and temporary only. Nor is any system yet adopted to supply what will be necessary, after the amount thus raised is expended. It appears, however, thesubject will eventually be carried through. On the other hand, the directory, by means of the organization and police, seems to gain strength, and to which a late measure has essentially contributed. At the Pantheon, and other quarters, there were nightly meetings of people, not inconsiderable in point of numbers, and who complained of various grievances, as they said, from the actual Government, and which ought, therefore, to be changed. The directory had its eye upon these assemblages, and, as I hear, gained full proof that they were put in motion by foreign influences; and under the mask of patriotism, more effectually to promote the purpose of disorganization, and in consequence shut the doors of the houses where they resorted. As many of those who were at the head of these meetings were active and ferocious agents in the popular societies during the reign of terror, and were probably then moved, the suspicion is well founded. When discovery, if to be relied on, tends to throw great light upon the source to which the atrocities that were then practised ought to be ascribed. Time, perhaps, and especially if the Revolution weather the storms it has yet to encounter, will doubtless more fully unfold the real authors of those scenes, which were so frightful to humanity, and so diabolical to our nation, and that they may be discovered must be the wish of all those who are the friends of truth, wherever they reside.

Prussia has, in the course of the winter, increased her force forty or fifty thousand men, and, it is said, exhibits a menacing look toward Holland, though her military condition continues bad, and is apparently received in Prussia. Spain, too, continues her military establishment as before the peace, and whose minister, Del Campo, is daily expected from England, where he has long resided. The probable conjecture, with respect to Spain, is, that as she feared an attack from England when she made her peace with France, so she finds it necessary to guard herself against it, by suitable precautions, till the war ends. Russia, it is believed, contemplates a blow against the Turks, in the hope now that Poland is annihilated, France otherwise sufficiently occupied, and the other Powers in amity with the Empress, to wrest Constantinople from the Porte, which has long been the object of her inordinate ambition. On the other hand, France says, Spain is ready to conspire with her for the act, in preparations for the war, exhibiting to her enemies a countenance firm and independent, and announcing to the beholding nations her resolution to conquer or to perish.

PARIS, 21 Ventose (11th March, 1796.)

4th year of the republic.

I address to you, citizen, a copy of a summary exposition of the complaints of the French republic against the United States of America. I wish you, and it is sincerely wished by that your Government, better enlightened upon its true interests, will be disposed to give us complete satisfaction.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

A summary exposition of the complaints of the French Government against the Government of the United States.

First complaint. The ineffectiveness of treaties.
1. The courts of justice in the United States have taken, and continue daily to take, cognizance of prizes, which our privateers conduct into their ports, notwithstanding the express clause of the treaty, which prohibits it. Our ministers have proposed different arrangements to put bounds to this usurpation: the Federal Government had itself proposed measures in this respect; the measures which were not accepted, and the last measures have fallen into disuse. The disgusts, the delays, and the losses, which result to our marine from a like state of things, are palpable. They almost deprive the republic of the advantage it ought to derive from this article of the treaty.
2. The admission of English vessels of war into the ports of the United States, against the express stipulation of the 17th article of the treaty: it is to say, when they have made prizes upon the republic or its citizens. The weakness with which the Federal Government yielded this point in the beginning, tended to increase the pretensions of Great Britain; so that, at present, the ports of the United States have become a station for the squadron of Admiral Murray, which for two years past has stationed there, to make excursions thence upon the American commerce, and destroy our property. This division carries its anxiety even further, by conducting its prizes into those ports.
3. The consular convention, which makes a part of our treaties, is equally unexecuted in two of its most important clauses. The first, which grants to our consuls the right of judging exclusively all controversies which take place between French citizens, has become illusory, from a defect in the law, which gives to our consuls the means of executing their judgments. The consequences of this defect tend to annihilate the prerogatives of our consuls, and by means thereof to injure exclusively our merchant marine, and for our marine officers. The ineffectiveness of this part of the convention affects, beyond all expression, our maritime service, whilst our vessels are stationed in the American ports. The judges, charged by the law to deliver mandates of arrest, have lately required the presentation of the original register of the equipage, in despite of the 5th article of the treaty, which admits, in the tribunals of the two powers, copies certified by the consuls. Particular local considerations oppose, in a thousand circumstances, the presentation of the original register; and under these circumstances, the sailors always make their escape.
4. The arrestation in the port of Philadelphia, in the month of August, 1795, of the captain of the corvette Cas- sius, and a crew, by the customs officers, under a charge of violating the acts of trade and navigation. This measure is contrary to the 19th article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates "that the commandants of public and private vessels shall not be detained in any manner;" it violates, moreover, the right of nations, the most common; which puts the officers of public vessels under the same restrictions. The English Government has had sufficient cause to have counted upon its justice on this occasion. The captain has been imprisoned, though the consul of the republic supported the action, and with difficulty has he been released. The corvette, though regularly armed at the Cape by the General Lavand, has been arrested (as it appears she still is) under the pretext that, eight months before she sailed from Philadelphia, she was suspected of having arm'd that port.

Second complaint. The impunity of the outrage made to the republic, in the person of its minister, the citizen Fau- chet, in the English vessel, the Africa, in concert with the vice-consul of that nation.

The arrestation, in the waters of the United States, of the packet boat in which the minister sailed: the search made in his trunks, with the avowed object of seizing his person and his papers, merits an example. This insult was committed on the first of August 1795, and after which vessel (the Africa) blocked up the rest of that month at Cowes, the frigate Medusa of the republic was not, that vessel ordered to depart. Till after this frigate had sailed, and order was given for a new outrage committed against the United States, by a menacing letter; and, for a participation in which last insult, the execrator of the English consul was withdrawn.

Third complaint. The treaty concluded in November, 1794, between the United States and Great Britain. It would be easy to prove, that the United States, in that treaty, have sacrificed, knowingly and evidently, their connections with the republic and the rights, the most essential and least contested, of neutrality.

The United States have not only departed from the principles that were consecrated by the armed neutrality, during the war of their independence, but they have also given to England, to the injury of their first allies, a mark the most striking of a confession, without limits, in abandoning the rule, which the rights of nations, their treaties with all other Powers, and even the treaties of England with most of the maritime Powers, have given to contraband. To sacrifice, exclusively to this Power, the objects which are necessary for the equipment and construction of vessels, is not this to depart evidently from the principles of neutrality?

To suppose, that the treaty of August 27, 1793, or any others, were intended to exclude the denomination of contraband even to provisions. Instead of restricting it, as all treaties have done, to the case of an effective blockade of a port, as forming the only exception to the complete freedom of this article, they have tacitly acknowledged the pretensions of England to extend the blockade to our colonies, and even to France, by the force of a proclamation alone. This admission, the recent case, which determined the neutrality of these States, and the declaration, made by the Republic, known, by his letter of the 7th September, to the minister pleni-potentiary of the United States at London, upon the subject of the order of the 8th June, 1795. After this confession, after, above all, the tyrannical edicts of the King of Great Britain, and the official honor of the King of the United States, there was reason to hope a different result from the negotiation of Mr. Jay. It is evident, by the clause which limits the continuance of this deprivation of neutrality to the term of this war, that Mr. Jay did not hesitate to sacrifice our colonies to Great Britain during the continuance of these hostilities, by which their lot will be decided. It is submitted to Mr. Monroe to bring this article before the British court, and to induce the United States to have contracted to defend our colonial possessions, and with the duties, not less sacred, which the great and inestimable benefits they derive from their commerce with those islands bind them to observe.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Mr. Monroe to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PARIS, March 15th, 1796.

I was lately honored with your note of the 19th Venice, (March 9th) objecting to several of the measures of our Government, that have occurred in the course of the present war, and to which, I presume, I shall herein render you a satisfactory answer. For this purpose I shall pursue in reply the order you have observed, in stating those objections; and, according to the light I have on the subject, give to each the answer it requires.

The objections are comprised under three distinct heads, a summary of which I will first expose, that my reply to each may be better understood.

First. Your first complaint is, that we have failed to execute our treaties with you, and in the following respects:

1. By submitting to our tribunals the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers.
2. By admitting English vessels of war into our ports, against the stipulation of the seventeenth article of our treaty of commerce, even after such vessels had taken prizes from you, and in some cases with their prizes.
3. By omitting to execute the consular commissions, which are important clauses of the same treaty. They are the only means for carrying those clauses into effect; the first of which secures to your consuls within the United States, the exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies between French citizens; and the second, the right to pursue, and recover, all mariners who desert from your vessels.
4. By suffering, in the port of Philadelphia, the arrestation of the captain of the corvette Cassius, for an act committed by him on the high sea, and which you say is contrary to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates, that "the commandants of public and private vessels shall not be detained in any manner; and the rights of nations, which put such officers under the protection of their respective flags: and by like subterfuge, the arrestation of that corvette, though armed at Cape François, upon the pretext that she was armed in the United States.

Second. Your second complaint, that an outrage, which was made to this republic, in the person of his minister, the citizen Pauchet, by an English vessel (the Africa) in concert with an English consul, in arresting, within the jurisdiction of the United States, a vessel which, though not armed, was marked, searching his trunks, and afterwards remaining within the waters of those States for near a month, to watch the movement of the frigate in which he finally sailed, was left unpunished; since you urge, that the measures which were taken by our Government, in regard to that vessel, and the consul, were not taken in a suitable time to remedy the evil, and were produced by a subsequent outrage, and of a very different kind.

Third. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England; which you say, not only sacrifices, in favor of that Power, our treaty with France, but departs from that line of impartiality which, as a neutral nation, we were bound to preserve. Precise definitions are given of this charge in your note, and which I shall particularly notice when I come to reply to it.

This is a summary of your complaints, and to each of which I will now give a precise, and, I flatter myself, a satisfactory answer.

First. Of the inexecution of our treaties with this republic, and of the first example given of it: "The submission to our tribunals of the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports by your privateers.

I protest, in reply to this charge, to ask whether you insist, as a general principle, that our tribunals are prohibited the right of taking cognizance of the validity of your prizes, in all cases; or are there exceptions to it? As a general principle, without exception, I think it cannot be insisted on; because examples may be given, under it, of possible cases, which prove it cannot be so construed and executed, without an encroachment upon the inherent and unalienable rights of sovereignty in both nations, which neither intended to make, nor does the treaty warrant. Suppose, for instance, a prize was taken within our jurisdiction; not upon the high seas, nor even at the entrance or mouths of those great rivers and bays, which penetrate and fertilize our country; but actually in the interior, and at the wharf of some one of our cities. Is this a case over which our tribunals, or some other branch of our Government, have no cognizance? Is it not true in the true intent of the treaty imposes upon us, and likewise upon you in turn, the obligation thus to abandon, as a theatre of warfare, in which you bear no part, the interior police of your country? Can it be done consistently with the dignity or the rights of sovereignty? Or, suppose the privateer which took the prize and led it into port was fitted out within the United States, the act being unauthorized by treaty; could we tolerate this, and refuse the like liberty to the other nation at war, without departing from that line of neutrality we ought to observe? You well know that those rights which are secured by treaties form the only preference in a neutral port, a neutral nation can give to either of the parties at war; and if these are transcended, that the nation so acting makes itself a party to the war; and, in consequence, merits to be considered and treated as such. These examples prove that there are some exceptions to the general principles, and perhaps there are others which do not occur to me at present. Are there then the cases in question, and which form the exceptions to which I have just referred, and I presume they are, I am persuaded you will concur with me in the opinion, that the complaint is unfounded, and that the government of our country—our duty—a duty we were bound to perform, as well from a respect to our rights as a sovereign and free people, as to the integrity of our character; being a neutral party in the present war.

You will observe that I admit the principle, if a prize was taken upon the high sea by a privateer fitted out within the republic, or its dominions, that, in such case, our courts have no right to take cognizance of its validity. But is any case of this kind alleged? I presume none is or can be shown.

2. The second and last of the articles of your treaties with this republic, states that, in contradiction with the seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce, we have admitted British vessels into our ports, which have such as have taken prizes from you, and, in some cases, with their prizes. The article referred to stipulates the right for your vessels of war, and privateers, to enter our ports with their prizes, and inhibits that right to your enemies; it does not stipulate that the vessels of war belonging to your enemies shall not enter; but simply that they shall not enter with their prizes. This latter act, therefore, is, I presume, the subject of your complaint. Here, that, in case such vessels enter your or our ports, proper measures shall be taken to compel them to retire as soon as possible. Whether you were rightly informed with respect to the fact is a point upon which I cannot decide, as I know nothing about it. Our coast is extensive, our harbors numerous, and the distress of our fellow-citizens from the misconduct of their own officers may have stimulated you, as well as the Government. Many outrages have been committed upon us by that nation in the course of the present war, and this may likewise be of the catalogue. But I will venture to affirm, that no contenance was given by our Government to those cruelties and outrages; and that they were suffered to continue without delay. You know we have no fleet, and how difficult it is, without one, to execute a stipulation of this kind, without your promptitude which your agents in our country, ardent in your cause, and faithful to your interest, might expect.

The third article under this head states, that we have omitted to execute the consular convention in two of its most important clauses; the first of which secures to the consuls of each, in the ports of the other, the exclusive jurisdiction of controversies between their own citizens; and the second of which gives to the consuls a right to recover such mariners as defect from their country. In the reported paper the supposed incompetency of the law, provided on our part, to execute the judgments of your consuls within our jurisdiction, I can only say, that as to particular defect is stated, so no precise answer can be given to the objection. And upon the second, which states that the judges charged by our laws to issue warrants for the apprehension of deserting mariners shall order their detention, and that the execution of our treaty, the presentation of the original registers of the vessels to which they belonged, as the ground whereon to issue those warrants. I have to observe that, by the clause in question, (the ninth article) the original seems to be required and that the copies spoken of in another part of the treaty, (the fifth article) obviously apply to other objects, and that should those vessels be brought to your port, I am, as far as I can, to call up to you, and to urge me here to add an extract from our law, passed on the 9th of April, 1792, expressly to carry into effect the convention in question, and which applies to both cases.

The district judges of the United States shall, within their respective districts, be the competent judges for the purposes expressed in the ninth article of the said convention; and it shall be incumbent on them to give aid to the consuls and vice-consuls of France, in arresting and securing deserters from the vessels of the French nation, according to the tenor of the said article. And where, by any article of the said convention, the consuls and vice-consuls of France are required to execute the laws of the United States, the consuls and vice-consuls of the United States, and their deputies, shall, within their respective districts, be the competent officers, and shall give their aid, according to the tenor of the stipulations. By this extract you will clearly perceive, that it was not the intention of our Government to frustrate or embarrass the execution of this treaty: on the contrary, it was designed to carry it into effect, according to its true intent and meaning; and that it has done so, so far as could be done by suitable legal provisions.

It may hereafter be deemed a subject worthy of consideration, whether the first of these clauses in that convention has not been complied with, in so far as it is practicable, from a failure of our Government, that the station independent of that country, cannot well be reconciled with any correct idea of its sovereignty: nor can it exercise its functions without frequent interference with the authorities of the country; and which naturally occasions strife and discontent between the two Governments. These, however, are not the only objections to the measure, though with me they, unanswerable and unconsiderable, were difficult for these consular tribunals to serve their process, and execute their judgments; a limited jurisdiction to a town or village only admits of it. In the United States, therefore, and in France, where the territory is immense, and the number of citizens of each country in the other considerable, as is now the case, it becomes impossible. Many of these, in each country, are an obstacle to the intercourse, true and useful, between the two. How can we, for example, compel their attendance before him? How execute the judgment afterwards? For the tribunal of one country to call in the aid of the officers of another, to execute its decrees or judgments, is an institution at least objectionable; but to send those officers round the country, through the range of one hundred leagues, is the true and natural method, and when compared with the numerous and strong objections that oppose it. So much, however, by way of digression.

Further, and last example, under this head, states, that the captain of the corvette Cressina was arrested in Philadelphia, for an act committed on the high sea, contrary, as you suggest, to the nineteenth article of the treaty of commerce, which stipulates, • That the commandants of vessels, public and private, shall not be detained in any manner whatever? and of well known rights of nations, which put the officers of public vessels under the safeguard of their own country, and that the vessel was likewise seized, though armed at the Cape, upon the pretext that she was armed some time before in Philadelphia. As you have not stated what the act was, with the commission whereof the captain was charged, I can, of course, give no explanation on that head. Satisfied, however, I am, that if the crime was of a nature to authorize our courts to seize and try a vessel, or that the crime was such as required the conviction of a French vessel, to prevent her returning to the French station, it is well known that the act is one which has never been committed within the United States, neither by our officers nor by the French, (the neutral vessel) as you apparently supposed, and that the act was committed in British waters, and that the vessel was armed contrary to the laws of nations, and by the proper officers. The arrest was made, you say, upon the pretext that she was armed some time before in Philadelphia, I have only to say, that, if she was armed there, it was the duty of our Government to seize her; the right to arm not being stipulated by treaty. And if that was alleged upon sufficient testimony, as I presume was the case, there was no other way of determining the question than by an examination into it, and, in the interim, preventing her sailing. Without the aforesaid act to the above principle, I say, it would not be consistent with the true construction of the decision was against her: on the contrary, such conduct would not only expose us to the charge of committing a breach of neutrality, but of likewise doing it collusively.

Second. Your second complaint states an outrage that was committed, by a British ship, upon your minister, the citizen Fauchet, in concert with a British consul, in boarding the packet in which he embarked, opening his trunks, &c. Of which the United States have no knowledge and remain ignorant. The course of events is, I believe, that the captain of a British man-of-war was seized by a vessel which he sailed, and which you say was not presented, as it ought to have been, by our Government: since you add, the measures which were taken by them, in regard to that vessel, and the consular, were the effect of another and subsequent outrage.

The punishment which was inflicted by our Government upon the parties who committed that outrage, by revoking the commission of the counsel, and ordering that all supplies should be withheld from the vessel; as likewise that she should forthwith depart from the waters of the United States, was, I think you will admit, an adequate one for the offence. Certain it is, that, as we have no fleet, it was the only one in our power to inflict and that this punishment was far less excessive than that of the President upon his counsel, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you; and by which you will perceive, that there was no distinct outrage offered to the United States, upon that occasion, by the parties in question; but that both the one and the other act (the attempt made upon the packet boat in which, your minister had embarked, by the captain of a British man-of-war to seize him) was the true writing of an insolent letter, by the same captain, to the Governor of the State of Rhode Island, in concert with the British consul there, and which constituted the second) were only several incidents to the same transaction, forming together a single offence; and for which that punishment was inflicted on those parties. In the last place, a further proof, and one that the President was neither inattentive to what was due to your rights upon that occasion, nor to the character of the United States, that he gave orders to our minister at London, to complain formally to that Government of that outrage; and to demand of it such satisfaction upon the part of, as the nature of the insult required; and which has, doubtless, either been given, or is still expected.

Third. Your third and last complaint applies to our late treaty with England; and which, you say, has sacrificed the interest of the most important neutrality and the reciprocal rights of nations and our own treaties with all other Powers, and even England in her treaties with many other Powers, has been violated.

1. In support of this charge you observe, that we have not only departed from the principles of the armed neutrality adopted in the course of the last war, but have abandoned, in favor of England, the limits which the rights of nations and our own treaties with all other Powers, and even England in her treaties with many other Powers, have fixed.

2. That we have also asserted that provisions should be deemed contraband, not when destined to a blockaded port only, as should be the case, but in all cases, by tacitly acknowledging the pretensions of England, to place at pleasure, and by proclamation, not only your islands, but even France herself in that dilemma.

I agree, that the reparation of such an infringement of England's rights, by the other neutral Powers, at the time you mention, and accused to by all the Powers then at war against England, are extremely dear to us; because they are just in themselves, and in many respects very important to our welfare: we insert them in every treaty we make with those Powers who are willing to adopt them; and our hope is, that they will soon be universally adopted. But we declare that the maritime Powers being arranged against her, you well know that she never acceded to them. How compel her, then, upon the present occasion, when that combination was not only broken, but many of the parties, then parties to it, and against England, were now enlisting on her side, support of her principles? You must be sensible that, under these circumstances, it was impossible for us to obtain from that Power the recognition of these principles; and that, of course, we are not culpable for having failed to accomplish that object.

I regret also, that we did not succeed in obtaining from that Power, a more liberal scale of contraband, than was observed in the treaties between England and the United States. In those articles of commerce, which were entered into in the year 1815, by the United States and the British Empire, it is, it respects England, that the list of contraband is made here, and everywhere else, it was equally an object of importance to enlarge the freedom of commerce in that respect, by diminishing the list of contraband. Perhaps, no nation on the globe is more interested in this object, than we are. But here, too, the same difficulty occurred, that had in the preceding case; and it was in consequence decided by a convention, that England, could not, and would not, extend the list of laws of nations to remain unchanged in any respect. It is urged, that we have made any article contraband that was not so before, by the known and well established law of nations, which had not a right to seize by that law, and did not daily seize, when they fell in her way? This cannot be urged, because the fact is otherwise: for, although we have not amended the law of nations in that respect, yet certainly we have not changed it for the worse; and which alone could give you just cause of complaint.

With respect to the object stated to a clause in the 19th article of the treaty with England, with presumes we are thereby prohibited bringing provisions from the United States to France, I have only to add, that no such prohibition is to be found in it, or other stipulation which changes the law of nations in that respect: on the contrary, that article leaves the law of nations where it was before, authorizing the seizure in those cases only, where such provisions are contributable “by the existing law of nations,” and according to our constitution when carrying to a blockaded port, and in which case payment is stipulated; but in no respect is the law of nations changed, or any right given to the British to seize other than they had before; and such, I presume, you will agree, is the true import of that article.

You will observe, by the article in question, that when our provisions destined for a blockaded port are seized, though by the law of nations subject to confiscation, they are nevertheless exempted from it; and the owners of such provisions entitled to the payment of their value. Surely this stipulation cannot tend to discourage my countrymen from adventuring with provisions into the ports of the republic; nor in any other respect prevent their entrepizes here on the contrary, was it not probable, that it would produce the opposite effects: since, thereby, the only penalty which could deter them, that of confiscation, in the case above mentioned, was completely done away.

Thus, citizen, minister, I have answered, according to the views of our Government, and the light I have upon the subject, the objections you have stated against France of its mercantile transactions; and I hope to your satisfaction. That any occurrence should take place to the annex of the republics, which gave cause for suspicion, that you doubted, in any degree, our sincere and affectionate attachment to your welfare, is a circumstance that cannot otherwise than give pain to our Government and our people. That these, however, should be enlarged, or extended, is nothing less than the best example of the most important of our complaints, on both sides, or of the best understanding and most important occurrence can admit of.

If, by my feeble efforts, I contribute in any degree to promote that end, and preserve the harmony and affection which have so long subsisted between us, and, I trust will always subsist, be assured that I accomplish an object the most grateful to my feelings that I can possibly accomplish.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Finding from the communication of the minister of foreign affairs, that the character of the mission about to be despatched for the United States, and its objects, were still before the directory, and fearing that the ultimatum communication promised by the minister, would be made at such a time, as would render it impossible for me to produce any effect on the measure itself (if indeed, in any case it were so) I deemed it my duty, and accordingly determined, to require the presence of the directory on that subject; stating the information already received from the minister thereon, as the basis or motive of that demand. An audience was granted, and in consequence I attended the directory on the 8th instant, in full council, assisted by the minister of foreign affairs, and the minister of marine. As I had determined, it was my object to open the subject, and which I did, by stating what the minister had informed me of their dissatisfaction with our treaty, and the grievances and violations of those provisions that had occurred during the present war, and respecting which it was contemplated to make some representation to our Government by their minister who was about to depart for the ports of the United States. I told them, that unless I knew by the first audience, it would be impossible for me to be able to the information of the director, how to come to the subject of the present war; and I hope to your satisfaction. Any occurrence for the purpose of discussing the subject with it, because I knew it was against rule; that I wished, the directorate would cause the minister of foreign affairs to lay open my complaints; receive my answer, and enter into a full discussion of them; and in the interim, it would suspend the decision of those complaints, and that the result of that discussion was before it: that the discussion itself could not otherwise than throw light on the subject, and in the degree, promote the interest of both countries, so far as that might be affected by their decision in the committee of the whole, it would be more than otherwise; and that it should be complied with. Some general observations were then made by that body, upon the subject of its complaints, and to which I made the answers that occurred at the time, dissipating its doubts in one or two cases at once, and particularly, with respect to the contumelious it heard was given in the United States to their envoys, by stating, than we received all: but even if visited us, as friends; that we did not, the could we, disunited between was then generally, on account of their political principles, because we did not know what their principles were: that we saw in all, the people of a nation to which we were much attached for services rendered us by it in the day of our difficulties, and treated them accordingly; and with respect to the President, that he had given orders, that certain distinguished emigrants, otherwise in some respect entitled to attention, but known to be obnoxious here, should, on that account, be excluded his public hall, which was open to all other persons. Several of the measures of the directory, reciprocated, with great eariness, professions of friendship assuring me, at the same time, that no step should be taken in the business in question, but upon due deliberation, and after the discussion I had asked should be finished, and my arguments fully weighed; and thus I left them.

I shall transmit to you, as soon as it is closed, the result of the communications which may pass between the minister and myself; and I doubt not, that discussion will produce a favorable effect. I shall certainly avail myself of all the lights within my reach, to do justice to a cause of so much importance to my country.

Upon some misunderstanding with the directory, Pichegru has sent in his resignation, and obtained his dismis sion; an event that must be deemed unfortunate to the republic, as it forebodes, a man of great talents and integrity. Clairfuit has done the same thing with the Empereor, so that the account of folly between the two Governments is fairly balanced.

The finances here continue in derangement, and which is not likely to be remedied by a late act, calling in the assignats; their dealings are still continued, with great eariness, professions of friendship, assuring me, at the same time, that no step should be taken in the business in question, but upon due deliberation, and after the discussion I had asked should be finished, and my arguments fully weighed; and thus I left them.

I shall transmit to you, as soon as it is closed, the result of the communications which may pass between the PARIS, May 5th, 1796.

I informed you in my last, of the 25th of March, that I was promised by the directory, in an audience I had obtained of that body, that the minister of foreign affairs should state to me such objections as had been urged against me by this Government, to certain measures of our own, and, in the interim, that no step should be taken, under the existing impression, not only in my reply was received, and fully weighed; and I have now the pleasure to transmit to you the result of the communication, I afterwards took place between the minister myself on that subject. Clairfuit has done the same thing with the Empereor, so that the account of folly between the two Governments is fairly balanced.

PARIS, May 25th, 1796.

Since my last, of the 3d instant, I have heard nothing from this Government upon the subject communicated to you in my last; and which the President, the minister of finance, and myself, was as shown by the papers transmitted in my last. Nor have I understood, through any other channel, that any decision is taken on that subject. I flatter myself, therefore, that I shall hear nothing further on it. As yet, however, no successor is appointed to Mr. Adet, according to his own request; and who remains, of course, the locum tenens until one is appointed. I mention this circumstance, because it is one which you will observe that it was at any preceding period, since it began. But such has been the varied fortune of that extraordinary war, and so often has it revived after it was supposed to be totally extinguished, that appearances, however strong, are not to be too much confided in, nor can it well be pronounced at an end, until the Revolution itself is closed.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 12th, 1796.

I have the pleasure to inform you, that in a late informal conference with one of the members of the directory, I was advised by him, that the directory had done nothing in regard to us, upon the subject communicated to you, in several of my preceding letters; and that he presumed they would do nothing upon that subject. I trust, therefore, that their counsels are thus settled upon this interesting topic, and that I shall hear nothing further from them on it. But should they take a different turn, of which at present there is no particular symptom (for the probability of such a course was greatest in the commencement, and whilst the first impressions were at their height) I shall not fail to apprise you of it, and without delay.

As yet no successor is appointed to Mr. Adet; nor can I say what the intention of his Government is in that respect. I presume, however, upon the authority of the above communications, that they have determined, in executing the power granted it by the decree, to have authorized none to stay of any nation, for whose good conduct they were satisfied, or whose respective ministers have not made themselves personally responsible. I could not discriminate between my countrymen, by admitting some, and rejecting others; but did every thing in my power to obtain an exemption for all. I have forwarded copies of an official letter, that subject to the minister of foreign affairs, and to which I have yet received no official or definitive answer.

The truce was lately terminated by the Emperor, in the manner prescribed by the convention which formed it, which stipulated, that it should cease after the expiration of ten days, upon notice given by either party; and immediately afterwards the campaign was opened by the French, and with the same success, at least to a certain degree, as attended their efforts in Italy. In two encounters between considerable divisions of the army of the Sambre and Meuse and the Austrians, on the right of the Rhine, the former have gained complete victories; taken in the first, (excluding the killed and wounded) about two thousand four hundred prisoners, and in the second, about three thousand, exclusive of the killed and wounded. In Italy, two new victories have been gained, and by Beaumarchais was forced to retreat through the Venetian territory to the Tyrol, leaving the French masters of that country. I send you the papers which give you the details, and am, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 13, 1796.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters of November 5th, December 6th and 29th, 1795, and of January 9th, 1796, and 15th, and 22d, 1796.

On a full consideration of the case at the consul at Hamburg, the President has determined to make a change, as soon as a proper person can be found to supply the place of Mr. Parish; the substitute, if possible, will be an American citizen. The minister of the French republic has lately presented the complaints of the French directory, in which they charged the United States with failing to carry into effect the articles of the convention, and of the late convention, and my answer to them is now before you.

With regard to the armed vessel called Le Cassius, about which the directory have made the representation which you enclosed, a full statement shall be prepared for your information; at present I will only remark, that she is the same vessel which, under the name of Les Juneaux, was fitted out in the port of Philadelphia, in direct violation of the treaty, and of the laws of the United States. This fact has been established by legal process; the agent who fitted her having been convicted of the offence in the circuit court. On her return to this port from the West Indies, she was known to be the same vessel, with a new name. Some Philadelphia merchants, whose vessel had been captured by Le Cassius, had her attached by the usual process of that court, and she remains in the custody of the marshal, awaiting the court's decision. If the property of the vessel had not been changed (and that it has been changed is yet to be legally proved) she would certainly be forfeited—forfeiture being the penalty of the law, one half to the use of the prosecutors. The alleged change of property gives rise to a question which the judiciary must decide. The process has been issued at the suit of private persons, not by the Government; and you know that the Executive cannot take the vessel from the cognizance of the judiciary. This has been repeatedly and fully explained, many months since, to Mr. Adet.

But the principal matter which now demands attention is, what concerns the late treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

Of the views of the Government of the United States on this subject, you have long since been possessed, as well before as subsequent to its ratification. These views were communicated to you for the sole purpose of furnishing you with the means of removing objections and dispelling jealousies. But no representations on the subject of the objections and jealousies existed. It has, therefore, been a matter of no small surprise to the President, that, during so long a period, you contented yourself merely with having those means in your possession, without applying them to the object of which they were transmitted. As early as October last, you predicted that if Mr. Jay's treaty should be ratified, it would excite great discontent in France. Early in November, you mentioned the arrival of Mr. Fauchet, extremely dissatisfied with the treaty; adding, that he was well received, and would therefore be attended to. On the 6th of December, you acknowledged the receipt of my letter of September 12th, written subsequently to the ratification of the treaty, to repeat and further explain the principles and views of the Government concerning it. Mr. Adet's objections to the treaty, and their rejection, accompanied my letter; and with such means in your hands—means amply sufficient to vindicate the conduct of the United States—not less regret than surprise is excited, that no attempt was made to apply them to the highly important use for which they were sent. Although you anticipated discontent; although the symptoms of discontent appeared; although these symptoms, as yet undetected and unanalyzed, might increase to an inflammation; and Mr. Fauchet's arrival, with all his dissatisfaction and prejudices about him, would assuredly add to the irritation; yet you were silent and inactive, until, on the 15th of February, you were alarmed by the prospect of the directory, accidentally communicated to you by the minister of foreign affairs, of sending to this country an envoy extraordinary, to represent to our Government their decision concerning the treaty with Great Britain; or that they considered the treaty of alliance between us as ceasing to exist, from the moment the treaty was rati-

PARIS, June 28th, 1795.

SIR:—I herewith transmit you a copy of a communication which lately passed between the minister of foreign affairs and myself, upon the subject of our late treaty with England; and which seems to have been produced by my reply to his second letter, sought in information whether it is probable that it may be treated as closed. I shall, however, I flatter myself that I should have nothing further from this Government upon the subject of our late treaty with England; but find that in this respect I was disappointed; having received a communication of foreign affairs, that the minister, after using various arguments, as likewise of the answer I made to it. It is probable that this act of the minister proceeds from himself, and not from the directoire; since it is probable, from the information hereof given me by a very respectable authority (which I communicated to you in my last) that this body had already determined not to trouble us further on that subject; and in which case less inconvenience is to be apprehended from it. But let it proceed from whatever source it may, I shall not fail to use my utmost efforts to prevent its further progress. I shall see the directoire to-day at a general audience, being a day (the first Decade of every month) on which they receive all the foreign ministers; and as I propose then to speak to them on behalf of the members upon the subject, I shall doubtless be able to give you a satisfactory account of the mortar or satisfactory information which may be in the head in my next. I have, notwithstanding, thought proper to forward to you immediately the above, and am, &c.

FRANCE.

upon terms favorable to France. It is further to be observed, that the French have entered Lepzighorn, upon the principle that the English held it, or rather made it a place of deposit for all their supplies for Corsica and elsewhere, in that quarter; and had also violated the neutrality of Tuscany against France. In that part, too, much English property had been taken. The French have also decided to abandon the field, and seek safety by flight into the mountains of the Tyrol, crossed the Venetian territory, and, in consequence whereof, the French pursued them to Verona. Thus it appears, that part of Italy can now well be said to belong to the United States. The United States receive the yield, and make heavy contributions to its support, except Naples, at the extremity, and who is now about to contribute, and Genoa, who loans money, I presume voluntarily.

Upon the Rhine, too, the same success has induced the arms of France. Both her armies in that quarter, of this summer and last, have acted with vigour, and with success against these new Governments. The Austrian troops, under their respective commanders, have been generally compelled to abandon the field, and to seek safety by flight into the mountains of the Tyrol, crossed the Venetian territory, and, in consequence whereof, the French pursued them to Verona. Thus it appears, that part of Italy can now well be said to belong to the United States. The United States receive the yield, and make heavy contributions to its support, except Naples, at the extremity, and who is now about to contribute, and Genoa, who loans money, I presume voluntarily.

The motive of the French in advancing. Perhaps it is the intention of the Austrian cabinet they shall unite, in the hope, as they are now nearer together, and their junction may, in consequence, probably be sooner than that of the French. They thus united, can be of the utmost value to the French, to attack the large and powerful army of the United States, and to check any further progress which they have made, in the province of Italy. In truth, it is said, a contribution of thirty-five millions of dollars is demanded. Where this bold enterprise will end, to what extent the French desire to press their fortunes, in case they are not repulsed, it is impossible for me to say. Nothing transpires from this Government upon that point, and of course we have no data whereon to rest a conjecture, other than you now possess. It is, however, to be observed, that as the Austrian armies retire, they approach each other as do the French in advancing. Perhaps it is the intention of the argument corps and the executive, with a view to a great spirit of contentment is discerned by those who travel through France, among all ranks of people, than was seen at any time before since the beginning of that era. It is even said that a change is gradually making among those who were heretofore deemed the implacable foes of republican governments; many of whom, now that they find they are protected in the rights of person and property, begin to lose much of their hatred to that form. In truth, prior to the establishment of the present constitution, the people of France had little opportunity of judging correctly of the merits of the republican system. They judged of it by what they saw in the Revolution; for Europe exhibited no other example to their view, and estimating its merits by that standard, they saw in it but a series of terrible and convulsive movements, which they dreaded even more than the tyranny that was lately overthrown. When, therefore, this circumstance is considered, and the improvement which the new Government has introduced is properly appreciated, we immediately perceive the cause to which this change of sentiment in that class is to be ascribed.

The misunderstanding which lately subsisted between Russia and Sweden, has been compensated by some concessions on the part of the latter, among which, the recall of Baron de Stael was included, and whose place was committed to the Swedish Government to Baron Rehmsen, with the grade of charge d' affaires; but the French Government refused to receive him, it is said, because he was presumed to be appointed under the influence of Russia. One of the ministers of Holland (Blauw) and Reybux, from Geneva, were also lately recalled by their respective Governments, upon the demand of the directory, and apparently much against the wishes of those Governments; each of those gentlemen having since received assurances of the unaffected confidence of its constituents. The motive of the directory for making this demand, in either case, is unknown; no reason, as I hear, being given for it to either of the Governments to which it was made.

Permit me to make known to you the wish of Isaac Cox Barnet, a citizen of the United States, from Elizabeth-town (Jersey) to be appointed consul at Brest. This young man is well recommended to me in point of morality; appears to possess adequate talents, and from what I hear, is industrious; and being in every view strictly an American, and therefore entitled to the confidence of this country, I beg leave to recommend him to your attention. The next evening, I understand this question will be placed on the table of the directory, and it is hoped that the great dock-yard of France, requires that the trust should be confided with care, and to some person whose character would repel suspicion. In addition, therefore, to what I have said of Mr. Barnet, I beg to refer you to Mr. Bouquet, of Jersey, whose nephew he is, and who will doubtless give you more information of his merits than I possess.

From the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PariS, 19th Messidor, (July 7th, 1796) 46th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

The hope of seeing depart daily the new minister, whom the executive directory proposed to send to the United States, made me sooner answering your letter of the 35th Ventose (15th of March) last. I call on you to the note in your note of the 9th of this month, (27th of June) to the arguments which that letter contains relative to our complaints against the treaty concluded with the United States and Great Britain. Time, citizen minister, has not sufficiently lengthened the point that was then in discussion, and from being ended, our complaints against that treaty have acquired since, in our estimation, new force. I will confidentially mention, then, that I am going into details, to announce to you that the opinion of the directory has never varied upon that point. It has been in this act, concluded in the midst of hostilities, a breach of the friendship which unites the United States and this republic, a breach of the reciprocal relations of the two nations, an abandonment of the principles and rights which subsisted between the two nations upon this point since their treaty of commerce of 1778. The abandonment of the principles, consecrated by this treaty, has struck us with greater force, from the consideration that all the other treaties, made in the United States, were struck them, as from the further one, that these principles are since generally acknowledged that they now form the public law of nations.

After this, citizen minister, the executive directory thinks itself informed, in regarding the stipulations of the treaty of 1778, which concern the neutrality of the flag, as altered and suspended, in their most essential parts, by this treaty, and would fail in its duty if it did not modify a state of things which would never have been consented to, but upon the condition of the most strict reciprocity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Paris, July 14th, 1796.

I have received your favor of 19th Messidor, (7th July) and am sorry to find by it that the answer I gave to yours of 19th Ventose, containing the exposition of your objections to our late treaty with England, was not satisfactory to you. To this latter letter, therefore, I shall also make a reply, and in the hope that it will produce its desired effect.

I observe that you confine your objections in this letter to a simple article in that treaty, which failed to secure protection in our bottoms to your goods; and which you deem a violation of a tacit agreement which, you say, has subsisted under our treaties with States since the year 1778. You have placed that article in the forefront of your objections, as if it were conscripted by that treaty. You likewise say, that the directory considers the stipulations of our treaty of 1778, which respect the neutrality of our flag, as altered, and suspended by this act; and that it would think itself wanting in its duty if it did not modify a state of things which would never have been consented to but upon principles of strict justice.

You see, aware, and with great reason, that you have no right to complain of that stipulation, unless it involves some existing obligation, either of the law of nations, or of our treaty with you; and in consequence intimate that it has become your right to demand, that all the articles of that treaty, whether they be of the law of nations or the law of all civilized nations. I shall endeavor to show that that article has violated neither the one nor the other.

I presume it cannot be controverted that, by the old and established law of nations, when two Powers are at war, either may take the goods of its enemy in a neutral ship. This doctrine is established by the most eminent writers, and is admitted in practice by all nations, between whom particular treaties have not stipulated the contrary. To prove this assertion, in its first part, permit me to refer you to the following authorities, and which are clear and explicit to that effect:

But you say that the law of nations has changed, and that the principles of that treaty have become since, in that respect, the general law of all civilized nations. Permit me to ask you what authority it was, or how it appears that it is done? I admit that it is changed amongst those nations who have formed treaties to that effect, and between those only who have formed them; but the doctrine cannot be carried. It cannot be said, for instance, that the assent of a particular number of nations to a rule which ought to operate between themselves only, is confirmed to all nations, and that the doctrine respecting our flag of war, is now such a law of the nations would have a right to dictate a law to another part. Such a doctrine would substitute force to right, and might be productive, in other cases, and especially in the hands of Governments less friendly to liberty than yours and ours. But this is not the doctrine that I shall endeavor to establish. It is my purpose to show that our war is, in fact, what our treaty of 1778 has made it, in spite of the present war, and facts well known to you; as it likewise is, that all your enemies, in the present war, have done the same, including some who are now your friends, and to the great detriment of America. Admitting, then, that a majority of the civilized nations are now at war, and the right of the neutrals to a rightful cause (as it is admitted the present one) is how was it to be done upon the present occasion, when the Powers composing that majority had shifted sides, and were now marshalled in opposition to the principle they had lately adopted.

Thus it appears that the article in question has not violated the law of nations, according to the opinion of enlightened and practical nations, and the practice of nations. Nor has it violated our treaties with France, upon which latter point I shall also add a few words:

It is to be remarked that you do not urge a violation of any positive stipulation in our treaty of 1778; on the contrary, you charge only the breach of a tacit agreement, which you intimate to have grown out of that treaty. But of what nature was that agreement, and whence is it inferred? The treaty contains an express stipulation, between America and France, that, when either of the parties are at war with another nation, it will respect the flag of the other party, trading with that other nation; and it stipulates no more in that behalf. And its reciprocity is to be found in a change of circumstances; whereby the party lately at war is now at peace, and enjoying in turn, (the other being at war) the privilege of its flag in trade with the enemy of the other. It does not stipulate that we will unite in imposing that rule on other nations; nor does it stipulate that we will adopt no other rule with any other nation. Of course we were free to act, in that respect, as we thought fit; and therefore have violated, by mutual consent, with your implied consent, or by our subsequent, with your implied consent, the treaty of 1778.

I concur with you, as I did in my last communication, on this subject, that the utmost respect is due to the principle of free ships making free goods; and with you also unite in the hope that it will soon become universal; since it is founded in justice, and the freedom of mankind. It is also a corollary to the principle, that the laws of foreign nations, of the same kind, should be respected, as far as is compatible with that freedom of navigation, and liberty of transactions of the neutrals.

The United States have, too, as you observe, inserted it in all their treaties where they could obtain it; and to which I may add, that they will most certainly continue to press it in their future treaties as opportunities occur, and circumstances may favor, till it becomes general. To promote which end, however, it is my purpose to observe, that an honest and just concert between the two nations is absolutely necessary; for, otherwise it were impossible they should succeed.

You will observe, that, in my reply to your complaints, I have herebefore confined my self strictly to the subject of those complaints; never going beyond them, to expose in return the injuries we have received from this republic, in the course of the present war. But I might have told you in the outset that, by a decree of the Convention in 1792, the articles of our treaty of commerce were set aside; and, in violation thereof, about fifty of our vessels were brought into your ports; their cargoes taken from the proprietors, and who yet remain unpaid; that, about the same time, and without any being assigned, at your present day, upwards of eighty of our vessels were embargoed at Bordeaux, and detained there for more than a year; and to the great injury of the proprietors, who yet remain unpaid; that, for supplies rendered to your islands in the West Indies, which have been and are daily made, and which have been rendered equally by the United States, for innumerable spoliations that have been made, and are daily making upon our vessels, by your law enforcement as well as your judicial officers, and those immense sums are due to our citizens, as authenticated by the highest suitable public authorities there and here, and for the want of which many of them are ruined. I say I did not bring these things forward, because it would have borne the aspect of a recrimination, and which I did not wish any part of my conduct to bear in any transaction with the French republic; and because I was disposed to yield every possible accommodation to your present exigencies that my duty would permit; and because I confided and still confide that your Government, paying due regard to those exigencies, was disposed, and would do all the justice in its power to those suffering individuals. Now in putting these things next to you, I have only referred to the stipulation, as to which you object, that, as the communications that were made on the topics, were made to the preceding Government, and are, in consequence, probably unknown to the present one; and since they are interesting facts which you ought to have before you, that your Government will be disposed, I think, in any such subject, to be friendly and not be a party to both republics to preserve, for ever inviolate, the good understanding which now so happily subsists between them.

For what has passed the United States have always found an excuse in that unhappy state of things that was attendant on your Revolution, and have looked forward to the period, when a free and happy constitution should be preserved and benefitted, and the French, who were your friends and benefactors, restored to their possessions, not in a painful review of any unpleasant incidents that have passed, if such there were, but in devising the means...
Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 15, 1796.

Sir:

Being highly impressed with the impropriety of Mr. Mangourit's mission to the United States, and, in consequence, desirous to prevent it, I have the honor to state my objections to it in person, to a member of the directoire, with a request that he would communicate the same to the president, and have now the pleasure to inform you, as the authority of that member, that the arrêté appointing him is rescinded.

I lately received an account from England of the capture of one of our vessels upon our coast, on the point of entering the harbor of Boulogne, by French privateers, under a presumption she had English property on board, as she was cleared out from that country. Although this report was not so well authenticated, nor accompanied with the necessary details, to enable me to act officially on it; yet as it might be, and probably was, true, I communicated it immediately to the minister of marine, asking whether such orders were given. He appeared astonished at the report, and declared that none such were issued. I conclude, therefore, that this outrage, if really committed, must have been unauthorized; and for which we shall obtain from the proper parties, in convenient time, a suitable reparation.

The French troops continue to enjoy an uninterrupted career of good fortune, both in the empire and in Italy. In the former, they meet with little opposition; for, as they have a decided superiority there, the Austrians appear in consequence careful to avoid a general action; and, therefore, retire slowly before them. And in Italy, a series of victories were lately obtained by Bonaparte over Wurmser, which are deemed more brilliant than even those he had before achieved over Beaulieu, Wurmser's predecessor. To protect the garrison of Mantua, and retrieve the fortune of Austria in Italy, a considerable force was detached from the Rhine, with other troops gathered from other quarters, under Wurmser, and who, passing the Tyrol, descended into Italy, and attacked Bonaparte, and in the commencement with some success. But this reverse of fortune was transitory as it was sudden; for so soon as the latter gave way before his antagonist with accumulated forces; and, in the course of a few days, as appears by the official documents, totally demolished his army, killing and taking upwards of twenty thousand men.

It is lately reported that Mr. Hammond is appointed to repair here to treat for peace; but as yet he has not arrived, nor have we other details on that head than are now in the English papers. With, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 29th, 1796.

Sir:

On the 18th of July I received your letter of the 9th of last May, covering the paper bearing date the 9th of March, and signed by M. De La Croix, the French minister for the German department; I exhibit it here, supposing complaints of his Government against the Government of the United States, and your answer to those complaints; and the letter of the 27th of July, the latter, together with a translation of the minister's statement, were transmitted to the President at Mount Vernon.

Antecedent to the receipt of this letter, the President had conceived it necessary to send a new minister to represent the United States at Paris, and had made a tender of the appointment to General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina, and a letter of the 19th instant from the President, which I received the 13th, covered Mr. Pinckney's letter of the 27th of July, declaring his acceptance of the office. He may be expected in Philadelphia by the close of the present month; and he will embark for Europe as soon after as shall be practicable. My letter of the 13th of June (of which a duplicate and triplicate have been forwarded) will have manifested to you the uneasiness and dissatisfaction of the President, and the cause of both will be apparent in the letter itself.

The President, feeling forcibly the obligations of his office to maintain the honor and interests of the United States, in relation to foreign nations, and our connexions with France, in particular demanding, from various causes, the most constant and pointed attentions, to prevent or remove jealousies and complaints it was impossible to conceal, it was a duty to express his sensations consequent on the receipt of your letters of February 16th and 29th, and March 10th and 30th. A further consideration of these communications, with other concerning circumstances, determined the President to make the appearance of those which you have been pleased to accept of the copies of your letters of recall. To enable him to accomplish the objects of his mission, he will require all the official documents in your possession, including your correspondence with the French Government, as well as with your own; and, according to the usual and necessary course of diplomatic agencies, you will be pleased to transfer them to him.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

SIR:—

After the accommodation which was shown in the case of Mr. Mungorit, by abandoning the project of sending him to the United States, I thought that the crisis had passed here, and that nothing was further to be apprehended from the temper which occasioned it. But this I was disappointed in; I now fear that it is decided to recall Mr. Adet, without nominating a successor to him; and that he is to be instructed to declare to our Government, that the customary relations between us are to cease, and on account of our treaty with England; with other things to the same effect.

* * * I shall see the minister to-morrow, and endeavor to lead him to this subject, if possible, and, in any event, renew my exertions to prevent the measure, though, indeed, I begin to despair of success, so often do they return with the same disposition to the same subject.

I am told the treaty with Spain is probably concluded; and by which France is to have Louisiana and the Floridas. This may well have been the cause that was the object of European jealousies; and of the manner in which that object was declined from the fear it might ultimately embroil them with us. The acceptance of it now, therefore, shows that that motive has less weight at the present time than it then had.

It is generally believed that an attempt will be made to invade England, great preparations being made along the coast for that purpose, in troops, boats, &c. and it is also believed that the fleet from Cadiz is intended to make a diversion somewhere, for the purpose of drawing the British fleet out of the channel, to favor the project of a descent. This is strongly supported by circumstances, and, is, therefore, more than probable.

It is even whispered that an attempt on Canada is to be made, and which is to be united with Louisiana and the Floridas to the south, taking in such parts of our western people as are willing to unite. This is worthy your attention, though it be mere report.

I will write you again in a day or two, since this is despatched in haste on account of the importance of the communication which it contains.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Monroe.

SIR:—

General Pinckney will be the bearer of this letter. He is to succeed you as the minister plenipotentiary of the United States with the French republic.

I enclose a triplicate of my letter to you of the 23d ultimo, in which the motives to his appointment are suggested. I also enclose your letter of recall, addressed to the directory of the French republic, and a copy thereof for your information, of the manner in which the President wishes you to take leave of that body.

The claims of the American merchants on the French republic are of great extent, and they are waiting the issue of the measures of the agents, and are ready to look into this business, in which the serious interests, and, in some cases, nearly all the whole fortunes of our citizens are involved. You will have the goodness to communicate to Mr. Pinckney such general information as may facilitate his inquiries concerning it, and hasten a successful conclusion.

I am, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

SIR:—

I have been just favored with yours of the 13th of June, the only one received from the Department of State since that of the 7th of January last, a note of Mr. Taylor of the 13th of May excepted.

You charge me in this letter with a neglect of duty, in omitting, as you state, to disspate, by a timely, and suitable application of the lights in my possession, the discontent of this Government on account of our late treaty with England; and you support this charge by a reference to certain passages in my own correspondence, which state, that this discontent broke out in last February, four months after I had received a letter from yourself and Mr. Randolph, upon the subject of that treaty; and whence you infer, and on account of the delay, or interval which took place between the one and the other event, that I was materially to blame in not having a concern to disperse apprehensions, and urge the previous and strong symptoms of discontent, which I witnessed and communicated, as an additional proof of my neglect.

Permit me to remark, that this charge is not more unjust and unexpected than the testimony by which you support it is inapplicable and inconclusive. Indeed, it was easy to show, that the circumstances on which you rely, if they prove any thing, prove directly the reverse of what you deduce from them.

If such discontent existed, and the formal declaration of it, or commencement of measures in consequence of it, was not (and the greater the discontent, and the longer the delay, the stronger the argument) and any inference applicable to me was drawn from that circumstance, I should suppose it would be precisely the opposite one from that which you draw. Where a discontent exists, it is natural and usual for the party feeling it, to endeavor to remove it, or express its sense of it in the pursuit of an opposite conduct for a great length of time, and especially a time of revolution, and when a different and more peremptory one was observed to all the other Powers, is no proof, without other documents, of negligence in me.

But why did this discontent not break out before these letters were received? You saw by my communications, as early as December 1794, and which were frequently repeated afterwards, that it existed, was felt upon our affairs here, and was likely to produce the most serious ill consequences, if the cause continued to exist. If these accounts were correct, why did this Government take no steps under its first impressions, and particularly in August 1795, when Pinckney was starving, and our vessels destined for the ports of France were seized and carried into England? Was not this a crisis difficult for me to sustain here; when the eyes of France were fixed upon me, as the representative of the nation upon whose friendship they had counted as the man who had just before been the organ of declarations the most friendly? Why leave us afterwards, and until the last stage, to our unbiased deliberations upon that subject, and without an effort to impede their free course? Do difficulties like these, with the result which followed, give cause to suspect that I was idle or negligent at my post? That I was at any time a calm or indifferent spectator of the progress of events, and which threatened injury to my country? Or that I withheld any light which came to my aid, and which might be useful in dissipating it? I do not wish to be understood as assuming to myself the merit of this delay, because I know, thinking and feeling as I do, that I was not a party to a wrong bias, and that I was not abandoned, nor was the true cause of it. But I well know, that I have done every thing in my power, and from the moment of my arrival at the present time, to promote harmony between the two republics, and to prevent this from taking any step which might possibly disturb it, and which I have done, as well from a sincere attachment to both, as from a personal desire to preserve and promote the cause of liberty. It is, what they may think or say, a continued effort on my part to conduct towards us, was the wisest policy which this Government could adopt, and would produce the best effect upon that union, which it is, I presume, equally its wish and its interest to preserve, and of course leave to its consent, the case which was considered. They had, therefore, this Government had it, that I have incessantly made efforts to preserve that harmony, and been heard in friendly communications, and often in remonstrance upon the topics connected with it, in a manner I could not otherwise have expected.

But you urge that, as I knew this discontent existed, I ought to have encountered and removed it. I do not distinctly comprehend the extent of this position, or what it was your wish, under existing circumstances, I should have done. Till the 13th of February, no complaint was made to me by this Government against that treaty; nor did I know before that period that any would be for, from the moment of its organization till then, the utmost reserve was observed to me by it on that subject. The intimations which I witnessed, were written before the establishment of the present Government, and drawn, of course, from circumstances which preceded it. Of the probable views, therefore, of the present Government in that respect, I spoke only by conjecture. Was it then your wish, because I suspected this Government would or was discontented with that treaty, that I should step forward, invite the discussion, and provoke the attack? Would it have been politic or safe for me to do it; and especially upon a subject so delicate, and important as that was? And had I done it, would I not have been justly censured for my rashness and indiscretion? And might not even different motives have been assigned for my conduct? To me has always appeared most suitable, as well as most wise, to stand on the defensive, and to answer objections only when they were made; upon a fair and reasonable presumption, till they were made, that none would be upon the principle, if none were made, that our object was obtained; and if there were, that then there would be sufficient time to answer them, and in a regular and official manner. By this, however, I do not wish to be understood as one having a particular influence with my countrymen, on this or other subjects, when suitable occasions occurred; for the contrary was the case, as is already observed.

What the circumstances were, upon which I founded my opinion of the probable ill consequences of that treaty, in its present form; or that as they stood when I left the firm, which was particularly impressive at the time, omitted then, but which I now think proper to add, because it was that upon which I founded the intimation given you, in my letter of the 20th of October, on that head. Calling one day, upon the subject of our Algerine affairs, informally, upon Jean de Brié, who had, in the committee of public safety, the American branch under his care, I found him engaged upon that treaty, with a copy of it before him, and some other papers on the same subject. I began with the object of my visit, and from which he soon digressed upon the other topic, and with great asperity; adding, that he was preparing a letter for me on that subject, to be submitted to the committee. I answered his charges in the manner which appeared most suitable, and told him, that if he would give me the letter which he intended to send to the committee, I would read it, and that I should report that subject between Mr. Adet and Mr. Randolph; and to which he replied that he had not. I then informed him I had that correspondence, which was an interesting one; and requested he would permit me to give him a copy of it; and further, that he would delay his report to the committee until after he had perused and fully weighed it; which he promised; and, in consequence, I immediately after gave him a copy of that correspondence. This incident took place just before the movement of Vendémiaire, by which the execution of the project contemplated was probably prevented. I omitted this before, because I hoped it would never be revived; and because I did not wish to give more pain on this subject, and especially as I soon afterwards found that the treaty was considered as not avoided by the Adet. I now mention it, as was found the strong ground upon which that intimation was given, as to prove that none of the lights furnished me, in that respect, were withheld.

So much I have thought proper to say in reply to your favor of the 13th of June; and now it remains for me to proceed with a detail of the further progress of this business here, since my last; at least so far as I am acquainted with it.

I sought, immediately after my last was written, and obtained, as soon as I possibly could obtain it, an interview with the subject of this letter; and being expatiate upon the subject, he was heard, as that could not be avoided. He was informed of what he had heard, and that the expectation was that they would then be dissatisfied with us, and proposed taking some step in consequence thereof; and which I sincerely regretted, because I had concluded the contrary was the case, after the explanation I had given to their several complaints; and because I thought any measure which had an unfriendly aspect towards us, would only produce what I considered mischievous effects. It was, however, on this they were disposed to insist. They laid it upon the foundation of a treaty with England, and thought that the honor of their country would be sullied in their hands, if they did not say so. I endeavored to lead them into conversation upon the points to which they objected; but soon found they were averse to it, and were of opinion that too much time had already been bestowed on that subject. One of the members, however, observed, that the abandonment of the principle, that free ships made free goods, in favor of England, was an injury of a very serious kind to France, and which could not be passed by unnoticed. I told him, that in this nothing was abandoned, since, by the law of nations, such was the case before; and, of course, that this article only delineated what the existing law was, as I fully proved in my note to the minister of foreign affairs; that we were not bound to impose the new law upon other nations. He replied, if we could not carry that principle with England, nor protect our flag against her outrages, that that was always a reason why France should not complain; that they never asked us to abridge our rights in this respect, but only to abandon or modify a principle, which had been in force for a long time, and under the circumstances we did it, in favor of that Power, was quite a different thing. Finding that at the time might produce ill effect, and would certainly not produce a good one. I proceeded next to the other points, and to him I had heard of their intention with respect to Canada and Louisiana; and to which it was replied, that, in regard to Canada, they had no object for themselves; and in regard to Louisiana, none which ought to dissuade us; that they sincerely wished us well, and hoped matters might be amicably adjusted, since they were disposed to meet suitable propositions to that effect with pleasure; adding, in the close, that the minister of foreign affairs was instructed to communicate to me the arrest they had passed; but in a manner to impress me with a belief that he was not disposed to transmit this answer to you any farther, without furnishing it in a manner calculated to satisfy me on the subject. Through other channels I have since heard, that this arrest is withheld from me, and will be, until the despatch is gone; and with a view of securing themselves against further interruption from me, in the present stage of the business the subject of.

From what information I can collect of the contents of this arrest from other sources, (for from the above note, I was collected) it is to suspend Adet's functions; instructing him to declare the motive of it; and which, I presume, will correspond with what was declared here, leaving him there for the present; but what he is further to do is not suggested. I have, consequently, referred the communication promised by the minister of foreign affairs, and which I shall endeavor to procure as soon as possible.

I herewith enclose you a copy of a communication from the minister of foreign affairs, with my reply to it; and by which it appears that a truce is obtained by our agent from the regencies of Tunis and Tripoli, with the aid of France.
As I yet have nothing from the minister of foreign affairs respecting the arrest of the directoire, mentioned in my last; and which I understood he was instructed to communicate to me. I therefore conclude that the delay is intentional; and that I shall not hear from him until the despatch is gone; and after which it will be useless. Indeed, I consider it might at present, and for reasons heretofore communicated, which every day further experience more fully confirms.

But, being extremely anxious to fathom the point, whether this Government intended any thing really hostile, beyond what it calls a reprisal for our treaty with England, or indemnity against its consequences; and, in particular, whether it can be, in case it is resolved to take any additional steps, proceed for the purpose of sending commissioners to a nation with whom they are at variance, in order to form alliances with such, or to bring people to a junction with them, and thus eventually dismember us, in case they were willing, I lately revived a conversation mentioned in my last, with a member of the directoire, leading it more directly to this point, than I thought I could obtain from him the answer I desired. He told me explicitly, they had no object in respect to Canada for themselves, that they were separated from the directoire, that they were anxious about Louisiana, and if they took it, it would be only in case of a war between Spain and England, and then the principal motive would be to keep the British from it, who would doubtless endeavor to avail themselves of such an occasion to effect dissipation of our forces. I asked them whether they thought this to be the case; and they did not exist, in the breast of a member of the Government, an intention or wish to disturb it; that they would take no step they did not now to our Government, and that therefore we need harbour no suspicion of designs from them, beyond what they did awant.

I have likewise obtained information from other, I think authentic, sources, upon this point, and by which I am the more confirmed in the integrity of the above communication. In short, I am satisfied no such project exists at present, either on the part of this Government, or the Western people of the United States; and that what has been whispered on that subject, is either the imagination of some designing, perhaps, with those who wish it, or the offspring of fancies too much agitated with the danger of the present year 1796; period, period so remarkable for the pernicious tendency which an unfortunate and disastrous negotiation had upon our affairs in that respect, till our late treaty with Spain, we were always, in a greater or less degree menaced with that misfortune; but, by that treaty and the spirit of a source which has since appeared; a union of interests, to incorporate every part of the Federal empire, there appears to be nothing in the political horizon which clouds the prospect before us, or which ought to inspire a doubt that our Union will not be perpetual. By this, however, I do not intend to indicate an opinion, that I ought to be over confident of our security upon this or any other point, or intentive to preserve a situation of the present, for I thought this to be the case; in the present one, therefore, a greater degree of vigilance is of course the more necessary.

An order was lately issued, as I have reason to believe, to seize British property in neutral vessels; and to bring those vessels into port for that purpose. I did hope, and, indeed, understood at first, that the arrest of the directoire was provisional, and intended to be applied only to such cases of British seizure, as occurred last year; and such I think was the case at first. But now it is said it is modified as above. I have written to the minister to demand an official information upon this point; and, in the interim, have communicated the fact, as I understand it to be to Mr. King, to whom the information may be useful.

I send you a copy of the treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between France and Spain; and which, as you will observe, contains no stipulation respecting Louisiana and the Floridas. Nor have I any reason to conclude that they will insert anything on that subject. I rather think, from what I can collect, that it is a point still in negotiation between those Powers; and that this treaty may be considered only as the basis of a negociation; whose decision upon them may be essentially influenced by the relation which is subsistant, for the future, between this country and ours. If this relation is established upon the close footing they wish it, then I think it probable (should their treaty of commerce and navigation be continued, or a new instrument will decline accepting it, from the fear it might prove a cause of jealousy between us, and weaken that connexion.) But, should the contrary be the result, then I think they will act otherwise, and endeavor, not only in this respect, but by every other practicable means, to strengthen their own resources, and to make themselves as independent of us as possible. Upon this subject, however, I never touched with them, nor I hazard a conjecture on it other than general circumstances already known to you.

Jourdan was lately compelled to retreat through a considerable tract of country; being defeated, as I presume, (for the details are unknown) in several severe actions, and encounters, and doubtless with great loss. He at present surrounds himself upon the Lahn, where he occupies a strong position. The Government, and the whole of their interests, is, however, on his route from Holland, at the head of twenty-five thousand men, to join, and, as it is reported, to supersede him; it being a maxim of this Government to remove, and without delay, every unsuccessful general, upon the supposition that the spirit of the troops cannot be well revived under the same person with whom they were commanded. This goes to show that the national hearts were then in a brilliant victory obtained over Wurmser, in the Tyrol, if possible, than the former one; having actually taken sixteen thousand prisoners, about seventy cannon, with all kind of military stores, and completely broken the army he had lately commanded the whole.

The march of Beurnonville from Holland argues a secret understanding between the directoire and the King of Prussia; and the late treaty between France and Spain, almost the certainty of a war between the latter and England.

An attack was lately made upon a camp near Paris, consisting of six or eight thousand men, by about as many hundreded; and in which the latter were repulsed, many of them taken prisoners, and who are now under trial by a military commission. Of these upon whom sentence is pronounced, some were condemned to capital punishment, which was immediately executed; others to transportation, and some to confinement; the residue, which constituted by far the greatest part, were acquitted and discharged. This enterprise was undertaken by a party who wish to overthrow the Government, or rather to maintain it, and the confederate, (for so I am a guiltier not expect to overthrow the Government) and whose ostensible object was to establish the constitution of 1793. The presumption, too, is, that it had favours in the camp, or that it would not have made an attempt on the camp; but of this there was no proof that I am aware of. It appears as if their scheme, or design, is conducted by the same active, though invisible agents. To the details of this trial we must look for a more accurate development of the character of this affair, than can be obtained, at present, from any other source.

In general, the people of this country are in war; but yet there are no symptoms of an approaching peace with the Emperor, or with England. The directoire, it is said, wishes peace, and upon reasonable terms, but of this I have no information to be relied on. The state of the finances, too, must be bad; indeed, it is inconceivable how three or four hundred thousand men, the minimum, in my judgment, of the French, force on foot, with the expenses of the civil Government, the colonial establishment, and the navy, are sustained. It seems incredible that a monarch could not expect to overthrow the Government; and whose ostensible object was to establish the constitution of 1793. The presumption, too, is, that it had favours in the camp, or that it would not have made an attempt on the camp; but of this there was no proof that I am aware of. It appears as if their scheme, or design, is conducted by the same active, though invisible agents. Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, October 6, 1796.

I enclose you a copy of my letter to the minister of foreign affairs, demanding whether orders are issued for seizing the property of their enemies in our vessels; and to which I have yet received no answer. I am confident, however, that such orders are issued, being assured of it through other channels, apparently too direct to admit any doubt of the fact.

I enclose you also copies of three notes from him, and of my replies; the two first of which respect the judicial process sustained in one of our courts against Governor Collot, late of Guadaloupe; and the third, a report said to be circulating here, that the President had laid an embargo on all French vessels in our ports. These communications contain every thing that has passed between this Government and myself, since my last; and, of course, every thing that I can now add to what you have already received.

The army of Sambre and Meuse has retreated to the Rhine, where it was met by twenty-five thousand men from Holland, under Bourronville, to whom the chief command is transferred. The reports of the losses sustained by this army are various; some accounts make it twenty thousand, whilst others reduce it to six, but, in my judgment, the former approaches nearer the truth; great part of its artillery must likewise have been lost. The retreat of this army exposed the other, of the Rhine and Moselle, under Moreau, to danger, but it is not yet extricated. It is known that this latter is also on the retreat, and the Archduke is now bending his force towards it. Some accounts say that Bourronville will be able so to co-operate, as to give effectual aid, but which is denied by others. At the present moment, therefore, nothing certain can be given you of the actual state of that army, or of what will probably result from it. In a short time, however, I expect to be able to make full and explicit on this subject.

It is said that an English minister is at Dieppe, on his way here; and that a Portuguese one is in town, with a view, no doubt, on the part of each, to treat of peace.

Mr. Monroe to the Secretary of State.

Paris, October 21, 1796.

I have lately received, from the minister of foreign affairs, the note I intimated to you, some time since, that I had reason to conclude he was instructed to write me a copy of which, with one of my reply, I herewith enclose to you. I likewise send you copies of two other notes from him, and of my replies upon other subjects, and which are only deserving of attention, as they serve to show the actual disposition of this Government towards us as at the present moment.

Upon a critical view of the note first above mentioned, it was doubtful whether my functions were not likewise suspended with those of Mr. Adet; and I was disposed in consequence to ask an explanation on that head, but from this I was prevented by the following consideration, that, if I had suspended, it probably would have been so expressed, and in explicit terms; Secondly, As it was not so expressed, that such a demand might tend to irritate and thereby widen the breach; and thirdly, That the same end might be obtained by the submission of one of my subjects to the minister for legalisation, since it would tend to prove, in case he performed that office, that they were not suspended. Accordingly, I took this latter course, and sound, as far as any inference was to be drawn from the circumstance, that it was not the intention of the directoire to suspend them.

This subject is now before the President upon the representation of Mr. Adet; and upon which, as I know nothing beyond what you now have, it is impossible for me to make any comment. He will report to his Government, and if he should of himself proceed in such a manner as he thinks most conducive to the honor, the interest, and welfare of our country; and, in the interim, and until I hear from you, I shall endeavor, and without a compromitment of any kind, to conciliate, so far as in my power, the good disposition of this Government towards us.

I send you a gazette, which contains an official account of the arrival of Moreau at Fribourg, after making a safe and honorable retreat through a great extent of country, and to which he was exposed by the defeat of Jourdan. He is now considered as out of danger. The army, too, under Bourronville is said to be reorganized, and in considerable force, so that it is possible, notwithstanding the late season of the year, something further may be done, and especially if the Archduke, by advancing, courts a new encounter.

Yesterday the English minister arrived; but what the prospect of peace is, there is no datum whereon to hazard a conjecture.

The Minister of External Relations to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 16 Vendémiaire, (Oct. 7th, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

The executive directory charges me to notify to you the suspension of all the functions which it has prescribed to the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic in the United States. It charges me, likewise, to communicate to you the arrest, of which I have the honor to send you a copy, and agreeably to which our ships, armed for war, will treat the United States, as these suffer the English to treat them.

The first step, citizen minister, does not need to be commented on. My despatches of the 19th Ventose, and 19th Mardiost, and last, and more especially the events which have, for some time past, followed each other in the United States, sufficiently explain its motives. Citizen Adet will enter with the Federal Government upon further explanations, which, I dare hope, will fully justify it to the measure of the executive directory. It is painful for the French government, to see its forces deprived of the trade, which is a good blood between two nations, whom so many circumstances engage to unite themselves more and more closely. But, citizen minister, you know too well from what the first blow was given to that friendship, which our two nations had sworn. It is very consoling for the executive directory, on reviewing its conduct, and that of the Government which preceded it, to find that the French republic is blameless in this respect. At present, its dignity would evidently be brought into question, it would neglect its duty, if it did not give unequivocal proofs of a just dissatisfaction.

The ordinary relations subsisting between the two people, in virtue of the conventions and treaties, shall not, on this account be suspended. The conduct will remain charged to superintend them. The eventual modification which shall be produced, in that state of things, by the arrest of the directory, I communicate to you, can, in no manner, be considered as alterations made by us. These would generally be commanded by the circumstances, and by the violation of the most general laws of neutrality, which the English take the liberty to commit, if they were not, at the same time, the subject of the treaty between the two republics, and the necessary consequence of the treaty since concluded between the United States and England. The Federal Government is too enlightened not to have foreseen all the results of that treaty, and, no doubt, too just to desire that its whole weight should fall on the French republic.

It shall not be the fault of the executive directory, citizen minister, if the political relations between the two nations are not speedily re-established on the footing they ought to be, and if the clouds, which cast a gloom on our alliance be not dispelled by frank and loyal explanations, to which it will be anxious to listen; above all, citizen minister, when they shall be made through you.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.
The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Paris, October 19th, 1796.

I have just been favored with yours of the 7th instant, (16th Vendémiaire) announcing that the directoire exécutif had suspended Mr. Adet's functions as minister plenipotentiary to the United States and had likewise given orders that the armed ships of the republic should treat our vessels in the same manner as the English treat them; and that both measures were taken in consequence of certain acts of our Government, which have occurred in the course of the present war; and particularly our late treaty with Great Britain.

I have received this communication with real concern, because I had presumed that the explanation I had given in my replies to your several complaints, stated in the two notes to which you refer, was satisfactory; and because I cannot otherwise than lament that any incident should occur, and especially during my service here, which betrayed a diminution on either side of that harmony and friendship which ought always to subsist between our Governments. I flatter myself, however, that this discontent will prove transitory, and that I shall soon have the pleasure to witness the complete restoration of that sincere and cordial amity which has heretofore so happily subsisted between the two republics.

I forbear to add anything, at present, upon the subject of your complaints, because, in the state in which that business now is, it could not otherwise than be unprofitable, and because it would ill accord with the respect I owe to my own Government, before whom that subject now is, for me to address you further on it, at the present moment. I shall await, therefore, with patience, as it is my duty to do, the orders of the President in this respect, to whom it belongs to direct the course it may be deemed suitable for the conduct of the present conjuncture.

Be assured, sir, that, as there is no political object which I have more sincerely at heart than a continuance of perfect harmony between our two republics, so no political incidents can occur, to give me so much pleasure, as those in which I become the organ of such communications as have a tendency to promote it.

I cannot close my reply, citizen minister, without making to yourself, and the directoire exécutif, my sincere acknowledgment for the attention with which you have heard my several communications, formal and informal, on this subject, and in which I have endeavored, with the best views towards the interest and welfare of both countries, to divert you from any measure of this kind, and I beg to assure you that the liberal sentiments you have been pleased to express in my favor will always prove a source of the most grateful remembrance.

Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 19th Frimaire, (Dec. 2d, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

As the arrival of Mr. Pinckney at Paris seems to be near at hand, if it has not already taken place, I thought it incumbent on me to inform you of the formalities which you will have to observe on that occasion. It is customary that the recalled minister and his successor transmit to the minister of external relations the copy of their credentials and letters of recall. Presuming that your letters of recall have already been received by you, I invite you to communicate them to me as soon as possible.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Paris, December 3, 1796.

I have been honored with your favor of yesterday, prescribing the mode to be pursued upon the arrival of Mr. Pinckney, who succeeds me in the office of minister plenipotentiary, with the French republic, by forwarding to you his letters of credential with mine of recall, and which I will most willingly comply with as soon as he arrives. He may be daily expected; perhaps he is already arrived, of which I will inform you as soon as advised of it. I have not yet received your letter of recall, or would now send you a copy of it; I expect it by Mr. Pinckney, being so advised by our Secretary of State, who then announced to me only the fact that I was recalled.

Accept the assurance, &c.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Paris, December 6, 1796.

I have the honor to inform you that my successor (Mr. Pinckney) is arrived, and is desirous of waiting on you for the purpose of presenting a copy of his letter of credential for the director exécutif of the French republic. By him I have also received your letter of recall. Permit me, therefore, to request you will be so obliging as to appoint a time when Mr. Pinckney and myself shall have the honor to attend you, for the purpose of presenting you copies of these documents.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Paris, 19th Frimaire, (December 9, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

Citizen Minister:

I have received the letter you did me the honor to write to me, in which you demand an interview for the citizen Pinckney, appointed your successor, in order to deliver me a copy of his credentials and of your letter of recall. I shall be glad to receive you this very day, from one o'clock in the afternoon to four, if you can find it convenient. I request you to propose it to citizen Pinckney.

Health and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Citizen Minister:

I hastened to lay before the executive directory the copy of your letter of recall and of the credentials of Mr. Pinckney, whom the President of the United States has appointed to succeed you as minister plenipotentiary of the said States near the French republic. The directory has charged me to notify to you "that it will no longer recognize nor receive a minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after a reparion of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French republic has a right to expect."
I beg you, citizen minister, to be persuaded that this determination, which is become necessary, does not oppose the continuance of the affection between the French republic and the American people, which is grounded on former good offices and reciprocal interests; an affection which you have taken pleasure in cultivating by all the means in your power.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

James Monroe, citizen of the United States, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

As my functions as minister plenipotentiary with the French republic have ceased by the letter of recall which I had the honor to present you some time since, and as it is my wish, in obedience to the order of my Government, to take my leave of the directoire executif without delay, permit me, citizen minister, again to request that you will be so obliging as present this subject before that body, and obtain from it as early an appointment for that purpose as may suit its convenience.

Accept the assurance, &c.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Monroe.

Paris, 7th Nov., (Dec. 27, 1796) 5th year of the republic.

I have the honor of informing you, citizen, that the directory will give, next Decade, (December 30) a private audience, for the delivery of your letters of recall. I invite you to come, between 11 and half past 11 o'clock, to the house of external relations. We will proceed together to the directory, to whom I shall have the honor to present you.

Accept, citizen, the expression of the high consideration and of the sincere attachment which are due to your civic virtues.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Address of Mr. Monroe to the Directory on presenting his letter of recall.

I have the honor to present you with my letter of recall from the President of the United States of America, which closes my political functions with the French republic; and I have likewise the honor to add, that I am instructed by the President to avail myself of this occasion to renew to you, on his part, an assurance of the solicitude which the United States feel for the happiness of the French republic.

In performing this act, many other considerations crowd themselves upon my mind. I was a witness to a Revolution in my own country. I was deeply penetrated with its principles, which are the same with those of your Revolution. I saw, too, its difficulties; and remembering these, and the important services rendered us by France upon that occasion, I have partaken with you in all the perils and trying situations in which you have been placed.

It was my fortune to arrive among you in a moment of complicated danger from within and from without; and it is with the most heartfelt satisfaction that, in taking my leave, I behold victory and the dawn of prosperity upon the point of realizing, under the auspices of a wise and excellent constitution, all the great objects for which, in council and the field, you have so long and so nobly contended. The information which I shall carry to America of this state of your affairs will be received by my countrymen with the same joy and solicitude for its continuance, that I now feel and declare for myself.

There is no object which I have always had more uniformly and sincerely at heart, than the continuance of a close union and perfect harmony between our two nations. I accepted my mission with a view to use my utmost efforts to increase and promote this object, and I now derive consolation in a review of my conduct, from the knowledge that I have never deviated from it. Permit me, therefore, in withdrawing, to express an earnest wish that this harmony may be perpetual.

I beg leave to make to you, citizen directors, my particular acknowledgments for the confidence and attention with which you have honored my mission during its continuance, and at the same to assure you that, as I shall always take a deep and sincere interest in whatever concerns the prosperity and welfare of the French republic, so I shall never cease, in my retirement, to pay you, in return for the attention you have shown me, the only acceptable recompense to generous minds, the tribute of a grateful remembrance.

Answer of the President of the Directory.

Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

By presenting this day to the executive directory your letters of recall, you offer a very strange spectacle to Europe. France, rich in her freedom, surrounded by the train of her victories, and strong in the esteem of her allies, will not stoop to calculate the consequences of the condensation of the American Government to the wishes of its ancient tyrants. The French republic expects, however, that the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh in their wisdom the magnificent friendship of the French people, with the crafty caresses of perfidious men, who meditate to bring them again under their former yoke. Assure the good people of America, Mr. minister, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always possess our esteem, and find in the French people that republican generosity which knows how to grant peace, as well as to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

As for you, Mr. minister plenipotentiary, you have contended for principles; you have known the true interests of your country—depart with our regret. We restore, in you, a representative to America; and we preserve the remembrance of the citizen whose personal qualities did honor to that title.
The Secretary of State, in pursuance of an order of the Senate of the eighteenth of May, 1796, on the memorial and petition of sundry citizens of the United States, residing in the city of Philadelphia, relative to the losses they had sustained by the capture of their property by French armed vessels on the high seas, or in consequence of the forced or voluntary sales of their provisions and merchandise, to the officers of the colonial administration of the French republic, having examined the same, together with accounts of similar losses sustained by American citizens from the French, in the European seas, or in the ports of France, which, in the details, were necessarily connected with the former, respectfully reports:

That, since the commencement of the present war, various and continual complaints have been made by citizens of the United States to the Department of State, and to the ministers of the United States in France, of injuries done to their commerce under the authority of the French republic, and by its agents. These injuries were first complained of and remedied by the Minister of State at sea, and by the Legation of the United States at Madrid.

3d. A distressing and long continued embargo laid upon their vessels at Bordeaux, in the years 1793 and 1794.

3d. The non-payment of bills, and other evidences of debts due, drawn by the colonial administrations in the West Indies.

4th. The seizure or forced sales of the cargoes of their vessels, and the appropriating of them to public use, without paying for them, or paying inadequately, or delaying payment for a great length of time.

5th. The non-performance of contracts made by the agents of the Government for supplies.

6th. The condemnation of their vessels and cargoes under the seal of the marine ordinances of France, as incompatible with the treaties subsisting between the two countries.

7th. The captures sanctioned by a decree of the National Convention of the 9th of May, 1793, (hereto annexed, and marked A.) which, in violation of the treaty of amity and commerce, declared enemy's goods on board of their vessels lawfully prizes, and directed the French ships of war and privateers, after taking into port neutral vessels laden with provisions and bound to an enemy's port, it may be proper to remark here, that this decree of the Convention, directing the capture of neutral vessels laden with provisions and destined for enemy ports, preceded, by one month, the order of the British Government for capturing "all vessels loaded with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France."

Such was the general nature of the claims of the citizens of the United States upon the French republic, previous to the departure of Mr. Monroe, as minister plenipotentiary to France, in the summer of 1794, and since his residence in the French capital, in the intervals which had been afforded him, he was instructed to press the French Government to ascertain and pay what might be found justly due. From time to time, as additional cases rose, they were transmitted to him, with the like view. In September of that year, he assigned to his secretary, Mr. Skipwith, (with the provisional appointment of consul for Paris) the charge of stating the cases, and placing them in the proper train of settlement, reserving to himself the duty of fixing general principles with the Government, and of patronizing and superintending his proceedings.

In conformity with the direction of the minister, Mr. Skipwith, shortly afterwards, made a general report on the injuries, and difficulties and vexations to which the commerce of the United States was subjected by the regulations and restrictions of the French Government, or by the acts of authority performed by its agents; to which he added a number of particular cases. A copy of the whole, marked B, is hereto annexed. This report was laid before the French Government, and, added to the various representations of Mr. Monroe, and his predecessor, it produced a decree of the joint committees of public safety, finance, commerce, and supplies, dated the 19th November, 1794, a copy of which, marked C, is annexed. This decree, apparently calculated to remedy many of the evils complained of, afforded but a very partial, in respect to compensations a comparatively small, relief, while it continued in force the principle of the decree of the 9th of May, 1793, which rendered liable to seizure and confiscation the goods of enemy's domicile, as well as those vessel's stores, which had been cleared exempt from that part of the decree of the 9th of May, which authorised the seizing of vessels going to an enemy's port with provisions, by the decree of the National Convention of the 27th of July, 1793.

On the appearance of the decree of the 9th of May, the American minister at Paris renominated against it, as a violation of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France. In consequence hereof, the Convention, by a decree of the 29th of the same month, declare, "That the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the regulations of the decree of the 9th of May." M. le Brun, the minister for foreign affairs, on the 9th of May, communicated this second decree to our minister, who thereon will find a new confirmation of the principles from which the French people will never depart, with regard to their good friends and allies, the United States of America." Yet, two days only had elapsed before those principles were departed from: on the 20th of May, the Convention repealed their decree of the 29th. The owners of a French privateer that had captured a very rich American ship, (the Congress,) (dated October 9th, 1796, to affect the repeal, to enable them to keep hold on their prize. They had even the apparent hardness to say, beforehand, that the decree of the 29th would be repealed.

The American minister again complained. So, on the 1st of July, the Convention passed a fourth decree, again declaring "That the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the regulations of the decree of the 9th of May, conformably to the sixteenth [it should be the twenty-third] article of the treaty concluded the 6th of February, 1778." The new minister for foreign affairs, M. Desforges, accompanies this new decree of July 1st, with the following expression: "I am very happy in being able to give you this new proof of the fraternal sentiments of the French people for their allies, and of their determination to maintain to the utmost of their power, the treaties subsisting between the two republics." Yet this decree proved as unstable as the former—on the 27th of July it was repealed.

The next decree on this subject was, that of the joint committees, of the 15th of November, 1794, already mentioned. Then followed the decree of the committee of public safety, of the 4th of January, 1795 (14th Nivose, 3d year) repealing the 5th article in the decree of the 15th of November preceding, and, in effect, the articles in the original decree of the 9th of May, 1793, by which the treaty with the United States had been infringed. It is not necessary to add here that, on the 21st of January, 1795, has been repealed by the decree of the executive directory of the 2d of July, 1796, under color of which are committed the shocking depredations on the commerce of the United States which are daily exhibited in the newspapers. The agents of the executive directory of the United States, (Lobou, ministre M. Lebrun, aulroux de la reference, and Lobou, ministre, commissaire de la reference, (marked C.C.) for capturing all American vessels bound to or from British ports. The Secretary presumes this is not an arbitrary, unauthorized act of their own, but that it is conformable to the intentions of the executive directory, the privateers of the French republic in Europe having captured some American vessels, and the French republic was induced to adopt an explicit and declared determination to condemn American vessels on that ground, pleading the decree of the directory for his authority.

The Secretary has already intimated that the decree of the 15th of November, 1794, was not followed by the expected results. After an interval, he was informed by the Secretary of State's request for information) that it appears the claims
FRANCE.

Delegation of one hundred and three American vessels, by the embargo, at Bordeaux, remained undetermined, no funds having been appropriated by the legislature for payment of them, and that none of the bills drawn by the colonial administrations in the West Indies had been paid to him, the treasury having tendered payment in assignats at their nominal value, and, afterwards, in another species of paper called mandates, which had suffered a great depreciation; and these mandates were not put into circulation; both which modes of payment were refused to be accepted.

The progress made by Mr. Skipwith in the adjustment of other claims, so far as known to the Secretary, will appear in the annexed printed statement, marked D. copies of which were transmitted, ten months ago, to the offices of the principal collectors of the customs, from the Department of State, for the information of our mercurial citizens.

That nothing might be left undone which could be accomplished by the Executive, the attention of General Pinckney, the present minister of the United States to France, was particularly directed to the subject of these claims; but the interval which has elapsed since his departure has not admitted of any interesting communication from him on this business.

In connexion with other spoliations by French armed vessels, the Secretary intended to mention those committed under a decree dated the 1st of August, 1796, issued by Victor Hugues and Lebas, the special agents of the Executive directory, to the Windward Islands, declaring all vessels loaded with contraband articles of any kind, liable to seizure and confiscation, with their entire cargoes; without making any discrimination in favor of those which might be bound to neutral, or even to French ports. This decree has been enforced against the American trade, without any regard to the established forms of legal proceedings, as will appear from the annexed deposition, marked E, of Josiah Hammet, master of the brigantine Patty of Weatherfield. A copy of the decree, marked F, is also annexed.

The Secretary has received a printed copy of another decree, of the same special agents to the Windward Islands, declaring all vessels destined to any of the Windward or Leeward Islands in America, which have been delivered up to the English, and occupied or defended by emigrants, naming Martinique, Saint Lucia, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, and Essequibo; and to Leeward, Port-au-Prince, Saint Marc, L'Archayse, and Jeremie; declaring such vessels and their cargoes to be prizes; as well as vessels cleared out unjustly for the West Indies. A copy of this last decree will be added to this report, as soon as it shall be translated.

All which is respectfully submitted.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1797.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

A.

Copy of a decree of the national Convention, of the 9th of May, 1793, 3d year of the French republic.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of its committee of marine; considering that the flag of neutral powers is not respected by the enemies of France; that two cargoes of flour having arrived at Falmouth, in Angle- lough, in January, and been brought before the war, for the service of the French marine, have been detained in England by the Government, which would not pay for it but at a price below what it had been sold for; that a vessel of Papenbourg, called the Therosia, commanded by Captain Hendrick Kob, loaded with various effects belonging to Frenchmen, was carried into the harbor of last March, by an English cutter.

That, under such circumstances, all the laws of nations being violated, it is not permissible that the French people should fulfill towards all the neutral Powers, in general, the vow they have so repeatedly manifested, and constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation, decrees as follows:

ART. I. The French ships of war and privateers may stop, and bring into the ports of the republic, such neutral vessels as are loaded in whole or in part, either with provisions, belonging to neutrals, and destined for enemy ports, or with merchandise belonging to enemy powers.

ART. II. Merchandise belonging to enemies shall be declared good prize, and confiscated for the benefit of the captors; the provisions, belonging to neutrals and loaded for enemy ports, shall be paid for according to their value in the place for which they were destined.

ART. III. In all cases, neutral vessels shall be released when the unloading of the provisions which are stopped, or the cargo of enemy goods, is completed; the freight for them shall be paid at the rate stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnity shall be made, in proportion to their detention, by the tribunals who have cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

ART. IV. Those tribunals shall be bound also to transmit, three days after their sentence, a duplicate of the inventory of the said provisions or merchandise to the minister of marine, and another duplicate to the minister for foreign affairs.

ART. V. The present law, applicable to all the prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect after the enemy Powers shall declare free, and not liable to seizure, although destined for the ports of the republic, provisions which may be neutral property, and merchandise loaded in neutral ships, which belongs to the French Government, or to French citizens.

B.

To James Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, at Paris.

SIR:

At your request I now lay before you a statement of the innumerable embarrassments and difficulties which our commerce has, for a long time, and still continues to labor under, in the different ports of the French republic. It is evident, if their Government does not soon remedy the incessant abuses and vexations practised daily upon our merchants, vessels, captains, and crews, the trade of the United States with France must cease. I cannot give you an account of all the inconveniences and oppressions which have been thrown upon our commerce; many of the consuls and their agents to whom you have written to forward such documents to my office, having not yet done it; besides, it would take volumes to expose them at full length.

From the communication, however, already received from the different ports, and from the information I have collected from the captains present, I can assure you that there are near three hundred sail of American vessels now in the ports of France; all of whom have suffered, or are suffering, more or less delay and difficulties, of which the utmost was not exceeded by the 3d. The impossibility of Americans selling their cargoes, and receiving payment at the ports to which they are conducted, or of their own accord arrive.

PARIS, Vendémiaire, 3d year, (October, 1794.)

3d. The difficulties and procrastination which they find in their transactions with the boards of marine and commerce.

4th. The non-compliance, or heretofore delay, in fulfilling the contracts, made by the agents of the French republic, in America, for supplies of provisions.

The seizure of our vessels at sea often gives rise to the most serious and well founded complaints. The stripping of their officers and crews, who are generally replaced by boys and inexperienced hands, in order to be conducted to ports, exposes them to much injury, and sometimes total loss; the confinement of our sailors taken out of their vessels, the sale of their cargoes, and all the sending the papers to the commission of marine, at Paris, involves the most unwarrantable hardships and delays, and, I am sorry to add, that all our vessels experience some of those difficulties; and, indeed, such as arrive with cargoes on account of the republic, months elapsing before the captains can get their clearances and papers, must be long lost on the board of the consuls themselves.

The commission of commerce at the different ports, having no power to treat directly for cargoes, it follows, that they must write to the commission at Paris for orders; and, after one or two months fruitless correspondence, it often happens that the captains are obliged to come up to Paris, where, being ignorant of forms and language, they have to encounter many difficulties.

It would be too tedious to mention all the inconveniences resulting from the third general complaint. In the first place, the delays at the commission of marine are incredible. The captains, whose vessels are brought into ports by the armed vessels of the republic, cannot withdraw their papers from the hands of the marine agents, but are forced to Paris, to solicit time at the time of the marine, a report upon them to the committee of public safety. The cruel delays attending this will be illustrated in the examples annexed. The report being made before it can reach the latter body, it must have the signature of the commissioners, and go through other formalities, and when it is at last received by the board of safety the vessel is not subject to the orders of the captains.

Judge, sir, of the tedious delay attending this; indeed, you will see cases where the poor captains have been many months in arriving at the above point; and I, myself, after having pressed several reclamations for weeks past, have not yet been able to bring one to that issue.

To sell to the commission of commerce is, still more difficult. When a bargain is concluded with them, an order is issued to the keepers of the public magazines to receive the cargo sold; who often pretend that there is no room to receive it, and frequently they keep the captains waiting weeks before their whim or convenience will induce them to receive it; this point gained, application must then be made at Paris, to the commission of commerce, for payment, who refer the captain to their board of agents; they make a report to the comptabilité of the same commission, from thence it must go to the committee of finance, then to the committee of public safety, from whence it returns to the comptabilité. This labyrinth of perplexity, of course, throws the captain into the hands of an agent, who preys upon his distress; and when he has not always that the captain can immediately touch his money. If, in the first instance, the commission will not purchase his cargo on the terms he asks, they tell him he may depart; but, on returning to his vessel, is most commonly prevented from sailing by the agents at the port. If it is mutually agreed that merchandise shall be taken in exchange, the difficulties become greater. If the commission, in order to bring the vessel to port, would issue a commission, on leaving the dock, they will not put those very articles in requisition. If the commission tells the captain that they do not want his cargo, and that he may sell to individuals, he finds that he cannot export the proceeds unless he gives a security that he will import afterwards into the republic the same amount in articles of the first necessity, such as provisions, &c. If the captain is so unfortunate as to have to treat with the agents of the commission, he is certain to feel their imposition; they frequently refuse to confirm their own agreements. In short, after every sort of delay and vexation, should the captain claim an indemnity, he has to wade through double the difficulties heretofore stated, and, perhaps, after all, to leave his business incomplete, in the hands of an agent.

The fourth and last general complaint is of a delicate and important import. Mr. Fauchet, the French minister, has made considerable purchases of provisions in America for account and in the name of the French republic; one house has engaged to furnish twenty thousand barrels of flour; thirteen vessels loaded with these provisions have already arrived at Rochefort, and I have now an agreement with the commission that they shall take care of these contracts; except that in the commencement, they assured me the committee of finance had ordered the payment of three cargoes at Bordeaux; but to my surprise, two days after, I found that no report had been made by the commission of that committee.

You have, sir, the commerce of this country being immediately under the control of one branch of the administration of its Government; that it was necessary to adopt some corresponding measures in order to protect the rights and interests of our citizens, and, for that purpose, having provisionally named me to the place of consul, I have accepted it, as well to answer your views, as in the hope of rendering some good to both republics.

I therefore conclude, permit me to observe that it is of indispensable importance to obtain some mode of having the claims of our citizens adjusted, for supplies furnished to the colonies of the French republic, and, likewise, the numerous claims in consequence of the late embargo at Bordeaux. I am authorized by many of the claimants to adjust them, and have many of the documents in hand, but wish for further instructions from you.

I would offer to your view a statement of the immense sums already paid by this republic, and to be paid, as indemnities for the extraordinary and useless delays of our vessels; but the consuls and agents have not yet furnished me with the requisite documents; it is, however, a fact, that not a single vessel arrives from America and departs from France, without my being informed of what millions are absorbed in this manner.

It is with real regret, sir, that I find myself obliged, the duties of my station requiring it, to present to your view so serious a matter as this, in my opinion for the earliest attention but, I do not forget, and it will ever be my effort to cultivate, as much as possible, a good understanding between the citizens of our country and those of France.

With respect, &c.

The Hon. Col. Monroe.

FULWAR SKIPPWITH.

A report on some of the American vessels captured by the armed vessels of the French republic, and carried into the various ports of the republic.

1st. The ship Alexander, Captain Woodward, with a cargo of flour, on account of the French Government, was captured on the 5th of August last, by the frigate Agricola, and brought to Rochefort, being stripped of all her military stores for sea, without undergoing considerable repairs, and remains there deprived of her people. The demand of the freights, the agreeable to the charter party signed by Mr. Fauchet, has been long since, and remains, with the commission of commerce.

2d. The brigantine Olive Branch, Captain John Buffington, taken by the frigate Semilante, was conducted to L'Orient on the 30th of August, with a mixed and perishable cargo the seals remain upon her hatches; and besides having been rudely insulted by having her colors hauled down, by order of the captain of a French sloop of war, she was deprived of her crew, and ran many risks of being wrecked by the inexperience and negligence of those who were put on board.

3d. The brigantine Polly and Nancy, captain Brien, was taken into Brest the 9th of August, after being deprived of ten of her ship's company.

4th. The brigantine Apollo, captain Parker, taken the 26th of February, and carried to Rochefort, and not liberated by promises, has not yet been heard of. The inhabitants of this town have made a report to the committee of public safety, in order that they might obtain the indemnity so justly due them.

5th. The ship Robert, Captain Whippy, taken by the Proserpine frigate, and conducted to Brest.

6th. Ship James, taken by an armed vessel, and conducted to l'Orient, in the month of August, after being deprived of many of its men.

7th. Schooner Ruth, Captain John Peter, taken by the frigates the Railleuse, la Resolve, and the Insurgent, and conducted to Rochefort, after being stripped of all her crew, except the cabin boy, where she remains with her hatches closed, and the cargo (of fish) in a perishing state.

Vessels of the United States now detained in different ports, loaded on account of the republic, their contracts signed by the French Minister, and payments not obtained, or at present likely to be obtained, of Government here:

At Brest, since the 6th of August, 1794, the Ariel, Captain Decator, brigantine Mary, Captain Fleming; brigantine Susannah, Captain Towers.

1 have demanded payment of the cargoes of those three vessels of the commission of commerce, and was answered, that the committee of finance had given an order for that purpose; but on my application to that body, I find they have not.

Arrived at Nantes in the month of August, the Goddess of Liberty, Captain Glad, and Mary, Captain Puller, 2,729 barrels of flour; the Norfolk, Captain Baron, and Bellona, Captain Brooks, 4,202 barrels of flour.

At l'Orient, 4th August, the Alexander, Captain Woodward, 1,395 barrels of flour

At Brest, 26th August, the Polly and Nancy, Captain Bryan, loaded with flour, and three others.

At Rochefort, 26th September, brigantine Sally, Captain Grece, 1,638 barrels of flour.

All theabove vessels are waiting, and though I do not get a positive denial, I can obtain no promise of payment for their cargoes.

Particular cases of American vessels.

1st. The Paragon, Captain Gerrish, I hailed at St. Miege in September, 1793, and cleared her for Amsterdam; in the month following she was stranded upon the French coast, in the Department of Montagnac sur mer. The judges of the Canton of St. Joseph ordered the part of the cargo damaged to be sold, and the good to be stored. The captain, after four journeys to Paris, fruitless attendance on the marine, and twelve months detention, has been forced to abandon the pursuit; and since my residence here, though in the quality of proprietor as well as consul, I have not been able to obtain restitution of the property.

2d. Captain Newell arrived at Havre in the month of June, 1793, with a cargo eighty-eight thousand livres value, which he sold, and purchased to the amount of forty-seven thousand livres in articles of luxury. At the moment his vessel was ready to return to America, a committee of the National Assembly appeared, prohibiting the exportation of all merchandise whatever; Newell was consequently obliged to despatch his vessel empty. Many months, however, after, he procured from an American commission permission to export those goods; and at his arrival at Havre, where they lay, not finding an American vessel to be hired, he chartered a Danish one, and shipped the goods; but, applying for a clearance at the custom house, he was required not only to give approved security of his landing the goods at his particular port of residence in America, but likewise that he should ship them in an American vessel only. The hardship of the case compelled him, of course, to Paris and he is now in vain soliciting that he may be relieved from giving a security, that as a stranger, he cannot obtain, and being allowed to export his property in other than American vessels. He is now the property of the assignees.

3d. The brigantine Hope, Captain Hooper, captured and sent to Rochefort in March last, whose cargo was sold soon after to the commission of commerce, has only from that time to this been able to obtain a report from the commission of commerce, and full information of the state of his property.

4th. The ship Kensington, Captain Kerr, was taken by a frigate, and sent to Morlaix, the 26th April last; the commission of commerce refused to purchase his cargo, notwithstanding he has been detained in port ever since.

5th. Some time ago, the commission of commerce purchased the cargo of the brigantine Iris; but finding afterwards that the articles which composed that cargo might be bought on lower terms, they refused to comply with their contract; the proprietor therefore demanded restitution of a considerable part of his cargo remaining unsold, and offered to take the price they pleased for the part that was; this was rejected; and the captain at present can get no satisfaction whatever.

6th. The agents of the commission of commerce purchased at Havre, the cargo of the ship Fabius payable in bills on Hamburg; but after a tedious delay, they would only give him bills on Basle, pretending they could not draw on Hamburg; though they gave immediately after bills on that place to others. However, after another month's vexation and delay, in this situation, Mr. Vans, the proprietor, obtained bills on Hamburg, which have come back protested for non-payment, and the commission refuses to allow the customary damages. Mr. Vans likewise sold to their agent at Dunkirk a valuable cargo, and the sale was ratified and approved by the representative of the people, then with the Northern army, and who was possessed of the power from the Convention of making unlimited purchases; still the commission of commerce oppose the fulfilment of the contract.

Vessels of the United States captured going to and coming from different ports, and their treatment by armed vessels of the republic.

1st. The ship Mary, Captain Titchcomb, sailed from London to Boston, was captured by the sloop of war the Hendrick, (a prize to the French frigate the Surveillante.) Her passengers, among whom there were three Americans, were taken, but the crew of the Hendrick, in order to get the cargo, and the cabin of the ship entirely ransacked. The passengers, though late at night, and the sea running extremely high, were hurried into a small boat, and sent at some distance on board the sloop of war. The women, of whom there were several, from the hardships they underwent, have been indisposed ever since. The ship entered Brest on the 1st of September; the passengers remain at this time on board a prison ship, and the commissary of marine has not yet made a report upon the business.

2d. The ship Severn, Captain Goodrich, on her passage from Bristol to New York, with several families on board, was captured by the Proserpine frigate, who took out of the Severn the passengers, crew, papers, and live stock, and sent her into Brest on the 1st of September, where the passengers remain on board the prison ship called the City of l'Orient, and no report can be obtained from the commission of marine.

3d. The ship Mary, Captain Preble, was captured by the above mentioned frigate, on the 18th August, on her passage from England to America, with a number of passengers, and has experienced the same treatment in every respect that the Severn did.
FOREIGN RELATIONS. [1797.]

4th. The brigantine Theodosia, Captain Justice, was captured by a French squadron on the 14th September, and conducted to Brest, with a perishable cargo, where she remains, her hatches closed; and as yet I cannot obtain a report from the commission of marine.

5th. The schooner Roebuck, Captain Kensman, captured by the frigates Surveillante and Fidèle, was carried into Brest in May last. Her bills of loading were given to the commission of marine at L'Orient, but not having been forwarded to the commission here, no report can be had.

6th. The ship Canton, Captain McGhee, captured in the East Indies in the month of October, 1793, by a French party, and sold at Brest, Isle of France.

7th. The ship Woodyatt Suix, Captain Hodgson, captured by the Jacobin and Atalanta frigates, and sent to Rochefort the 15th September, has a perishable cargo on board, and no report can yet be obtained of the commission of marine; this vessel, on her last voyage to Bordeaux, was detained nine months.

8th. The brigantine Je Peggy, taken by an armed brigantine of the republic, was conducted to Rochefort the 7th: the captain and crew were in prison during eight days, the seals put upon the hatches, and the papers taken from the captain.

9th. The ship George, Captain Symes, captured by the frigate La Galathie, and carried into Morbih in January last, her bills of lading and cargo were given to the commission of marine; it was landed and stored by order of the judge of the peace, and not till some months after was a report made to the committee of salute public.

10th. The brigantine Hope, Captain Hooper, taken by three frigates, and conducted to Rochefort in the month of March, remains there still, and the captain at Paris unable to close his business.

11th. The ship Union, Captain Bird, taken the 12th January, by the frigate La Roiseau.

Art. I. The vessels of the United States, and those of the other neutral powers, may freely enter the ports of the republic, and go out thence, whenever they shall think proper and it shall not be permitted that any constituted authority may delay their departure, or obligate the masters to sell their cargoes, against their consent.

II. When the masters or owners of neutral vessels think proper to sell their cargoes to Government, they shall be permitted to do so, in manner which shall be mutually agreed upon.

III. It is enjoined upon all commanders of naval armaments, divisions, squadrons, fleets, or vessels, to respect and cause to be respected, under their responsibility, towards neutrals, and the allies of the republic, the law of nations, and the provisions of treaties, by a strict compliance with the terms of the decree of the National Convention of the 27th October, 1792.

IV. In consequence, they are expressly forbidden to make these vessels deviate from their voyages; to take from on board of them the captains, sailors, or passengers, except soldiers actually in the service of enemy Powers; and to seize the effects or merchandise which may be found therein.

V. There is excepted from the prohibition contained in the foregoing article—

2d. Merchandise taken neutral, which is called contraband or prohibited. There is comprised under the name of contraband or prohibited merchandise, arms, instruments, and munitions of war of every kind, horses, and their furniture, and every kind of goods, wares, and merchandise, destined for a place actually besieged, blockaded, or invested.

VII. The freight of enemy goods shall be paid at the rate contained in the bill of lading or charter party; and the master shall have permission to employ the amount of it in the purchase of merchandise of the growth or fabric of the republic, the exportation of which may be permitted.

VIII. The master of a vessel, on board of which shall be found the merchandise above described, shall be free to depart as soon as they shall be unloaded.

IX. In case merchandise, seized as belonging to enemies, shall appear to belong to neutrals, and be declared, in consequence, not to be good prize, they shall be restored unchanged to the owner, if he shall not rather agree to sell them.

X. The commission of marine shall immediately present to the committee of public safety a list of every native subject of the Powers with whom the French republic is at war, who may (up to this day) have been seized in neutral vessels, and their complaints shall be decided upon by particular decrees.

XI. The indemnities due to neutral masters, who have been detained at Bordeaux, in consequence of the embargo which was laid there, shall be adjusted, without delay, by the commission of marine, conformably to the decree of the committee of public safety of the 7th Germinal. This commission shall render an account, within six days, of the present situation of those claims.

XII. The commission of marine is specially charged to receive and to examine the accounts which shall be presented to it by the agent of the United States, concerning the supplies which the American merchants have furnished to the administrators of St. Domingo. It shall take all necessary measures to procure for the interested the most speedy justice; and it shall present to the committee of public safety, finances, commerce, and supplies, the result of its doings on this subject.

XIII. The commission of marine is charged to cause the present decree to be published in all the ports of the republic.

The commission of foreign relations shall transmit it to the agents of the republic, to the allied or neutral nations, with orders to communicate it to them.

A copy of it shall be delivered to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to serve as an answer to the memorial presented by him on the 17th of last Précédent.

This case has not yet been determined.

87. Brig Hero, Captain Blunt; Messrs. David Lamb, Montgomery. Claimed for their part of the cargo; not determined.

107. Alliance, owned by Captains Samuel Gerrish. This vessel was cast away on the coast near Boulgue; the Government officers seized on the property that was saved, and the committee of public safety passed an arrézé, ordering the sale of the same, and that out of the proceeds the captain should receive his freight. The goods saved were sold at vendue for assignats at the maximum price, which assignats would hardly pay near one-third of the freight. I have no ground for protest against the illegality of the proceeding as contrary to the convention made between France and America; no determination.
108. Brig Triton, Captain William Ridgway, captured by the French privateer Rochamboue, and carried into Martinique. The vessel was released, but the captain condemned to pay 2,300 liv. specie to the privateer. Granted a restitution, and an indemnity for detention. The whole rejected by the commission of marine, because the captain was not on board, nor the ship's papers, when the capture was made.

France, wanted to proceed to the southward, with flour and bread for sale. He declared at the custom house on entering seized. Claimed for him restitution of the same.

119. Armstrong and Barnwell, of New York. Claimed for them the payment of a bill of the French admin-

Johannes freight, and $2,000 indemnity for the loss of his vessel.

139. John Burns, master of the sloop Lark, of Philadelphia. Claimed for him the payment of five colonial istration of Port au Prince on citizen Genet, the one, No. 19, for liv. 10,951 17 9, and the other, No. 20, for liv.

8,808 17. I wish they had been protested, and the protest transmitted to my office.

145. Ship Commerce, Captain Enoch Frebelle. Claimed for Messrs. Smith, De Saussure, and Darrel, the price of four thousand dollars, being the amount of the French privateer Tyger, of St. Malo.

146. British brig Mary Ann, Captain John Simpson; Archibald Gracie. Claimed for him the tobacco on board, as it was shipped before the time allowed by the treaty to take notice of its contents.

147. Thomas Hart and John Hart, owners. Claimed for an ordinance from the minister of St. Domingo, for 19,980 liv. specie, and that for a bond of 5,744 liv. 12 sous, 6 den. signed Boneva, cannot be supported for want of original papers and vouchers.

148. Paul Siemens. His claim for supplies of flour and gin cannot be supported for the same reasons.

149. Peter La Maigre, of Philadelphia. There are a number of copies of colonial drafts and ordinances, the amount of which cannot be claimed for want of original papers; also some original colonial bills, which the Government pay in assignats, at their nominal value, and which I have not thought proper to receive till authorized to that effect by the executors of La Maigre, deceased.

150. Fair American, Captain Rt. Gillet. Claimed for Messrs. Vanuxem and Lambrecht the amount of the cargo abandoned at Cape Francois at the time of its destruction, amounting to liv. 145,885 19 7. Claimed at the same time, for the same owners, liv. 33,695, for four barrel delivered at Port Republician in 1793. Claimed, likewise, for the same, liv. 15,470, for five hundred barrels of flour, sold to the administration of Port au Prince. These three claims rejected for want of original papers and vouchers.

195. Brig Kitty, Captain William Waters, owned by Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia; condemned at Basseterre, Guadeloupe. Having no official paper, not even a legal copy of the judgment, I have wrote to Mr. Girard, for the necessary papers and vouchers to support the claim.

194. Schooner Alantana, of Washington, in North Carolina, formerly the Washington) Captain Hugh Huston; captured, condemned, and sold at Basseterre, Guadeloupe. No new copy of the condemnation; no other paper but the Captain's protest, which is insufficient to present a claim upon.

195. Ship Favorite; sloop, Samuel Montgomery Brown, of Philadelphia. Ship and cargo were condemned at Port au Prince for having not declared all the produce on board. Not a single official paper to support the fact; only relations of it by the sloop owner.

196. Messrs. James McCurrach & Co. of Philadelphia. Two copies of drafts from Port Republician on citizen Genet. There should have been, at least, certified two copies by the French consul at Philadelphia, and they should be under certificate of the said consul that the originals were deposited in his office.

197. Walter Stewart, of Philadelphia. His claim for livres 90,344 18, for supplies to the French Government of St. Domingo, proceeding from the cargo of the brig Active, Captain Aaron Welch, and his other claim, for 32,450 livres, for four delivered at St. Marc, are only supported by copies of ordinances, certified by a public notary, which is not sufficient.

198. Bartholomew Sarrazin, of Philadelphia. His claim for property destroyed at the Cape is not supported by affidavits of indifferent persons, of the amount and value of it, or by any other testimony than his own.

199. Brig Brothers, Captain John Baptist Smith, owned by James Barry, of Philadelphia. There is only the Captain's protest of his being taken by a French letter of marque, the Cta Ira, Captain Paris, fitted out at Charleston, and carried into St. Bartholomew, whence the captain fled before condemnation. No claim can be supported without the assistance of some other evidence.

200. Schooner Mary, Captain Frederick King. No other paper but the protest to prove that the cargo, left in the hands of Michael Levy, Aux Cayes, was taken by the orders of the Commissary Polyverell, and not paid for.

201. Messrs. Nicholas Cruger, George Codwise, and Joseph Roose. The copies of three ordinances of Guadaloupe, on citizen Genet, not sufficient to obtain payment; claims suspended for want of vouchers, original papers, or copies and authenticated.

202. Schooner Polly, Captain Matthew Price, captured by the French privateer Barbonnaire, and carried into Port au Prince, where the cargo was condemned.

203. Messrs. Petit and Bayard, of Philadelphia. Copy of an ordinance from Port Republician on citizen Genet, on account of pork, proceeding from the cargo of the schooner Industry, and oil, of the schooner Franklin, delivered at the Cape, and on account of property left at the Cape at the time of its destruction; but no pieces of evidence or vouchers to support any part of the claim.

204. John Mayben, of Philadelphia. Several copies of ordinances from the French West India Islands; but no original paper to support a demand of payment.

205. Sloop Mary Anne, of New Haven, Captain William Brentnall. Nothing but the copy of a declaration, on oath, of the mate and one of the hands, that the said vessel was plundered by the French, and then captured by the British.

206. Schooner Polly, of Washington, in North Carolina, Captain Nathaniel Willis. Freight and cargo plundered by a French privateer; no other paper to ground a demand but upon the protest.

207. Schooner Lacy, Captain Loudon Bailey. The captain's account of what the administration of Port au Paix, island of St. Domingo, allowed him for his cargo, and what it would have fetched at the current price; no evidence to support the fact.

208. Schooner Betsey, Captain John Murphy. Mr. William Patterson, of Baltimore, has transmitted an account of the cargo belonging to him, taken by the municipality of Ponte à Petre, but no evidence to support the demand of payment.

209. James Saddler. Claimed his part of the cargo; not determined.

210. Messrs. Tapp, Allum, and Lee. Claimed their part of the cargo; property released by arrêté of 28th April, 1795; invoices wanted to recover the value.

In witness of the foregoing being a true statement of the one hundred and seventy American claims, as there respectively described, and as will appear to be supported upon the various documents deposited in the chancery of my office, I have hereunto affixed my name and seal of office, at Paris, this 20th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and of American independence the twentieth.

In witness of the foregoing being a true and exact copy of the original deposited in the chancery of my office,
I have hereunto affixed my name and seal of office, at Paris, this 20th day of November, 1795, and of American Independence, the twentieth.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.
I. JOSIAH HEMSTED, late master of the brigantine Patty, which, with her cargo, were the property of Justus Riley, merchant, of Wethersfield, in the State of Connecticut, testify and declare, that I sailed the said brigantine from New London, in the same State, on the 31st day of July last, bound to the island of St. Bartholomew's: that, on the second day of September following, being in the latitude of seventeen degrees and twenty-four minutes north of the equator, according to my observations, I was captured by a French cruiser, called the Iris, Lemot, captain, and carried into Guadeloupe, arriving on the fifth of said September at Basseterre: that on the same day I was taken before Victor Hugues, whose first words addressed to me were these: "I have confiscated your vessel and cargo, you damned rascal," doubling his fist and running it close to my face; and he continued talking for some time, reviling the Government and people of the United States: that, on the 9th of September, I applied to Victor Hugues to be informed when my vessel and cargo were to be tried, and he answered, that they had been already tried, and I might go about my business. I then requested a paper to produce to my owner as evidence of the capture and condemnation of his vessel and cargo, which was granted: that I twice applied to Victor Hugues to allow me something to enable myself and people to leave the island, but could obtain nothing.

City of Philadelphia, 8th.
On the ninth day of November, Anno Domini, 1796, before me, Hilary Baker, mayor of the city of Philadelphia, personally appeared the within named Josiah Hemsted, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, doth solemnly declare and depose, that all and every the facts stated in the within declaration, by him this day before me subscribed, are true. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the day and year aforesaid.

HILARY BAKER, Mayor. [L. s.]

Extract from the Register of the Special Agency of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands.

The Special agents of the executive directory to the Windward Islands:

Considering that the laws as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry to the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises:

Considering that, notwithstanding the complaints of the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic near the United States of North America, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 29th July, 1796, those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels loaded with horses for the English:

Decree, that from this day forward, all vessels loaded with merchandises designated by the name of contraband, as armaments or stores of war, shall be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

At Basseterre, Guadeloupe, the 1st August, 1796. Signed on the register.

VICTOR HUGUES—LEBAS.

VAUCHELET, Secretary of the agency.

The Special Agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands.

Considering that the ports of the Windward and Leeward Islands, as well as those of Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by emigrants, are in a state of regular siege, and not entitled to the same advantages as the ports of the different English colonies, possessed by that Power before the war, or to other rights.

Considering that it is against every principle to treat a horde of insurgents, destitute of country, without government, and without a flag, with the same respect as civilized nations preserve towards each other during a war.

Considering that, by the authentic acts which are in our possession, it is proved that the divers places of the colonies delivered up to the English by the rebel Frenchmen and Batavians no more belong to the British Government than la Vendée, in which the English ministry had, in like manner, mercenary troops under pay,—some regiments clad in the same uniform as those of England: considering that, in virtue of the 3d article of the treaty of alliance, concluded at Paris on the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former Power engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war, and that the Government and the commerce of the United States enjoy all the advantages of what kind soever, horses and their furniture, shall be stopped by the ships of war and privates, to be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

At Basseterre, Guadaloupe, the 1st August, 1796. Signed on the register.

VAUCHELET, Secretary of the agency.

ARTICLE 1. The ships of the republican and French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into the ports of the republican vessels destined for the Windward and Leeward Islands of America, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are, Martinico, St. Lucie, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo.

And at the Leeward, Port au Prince, St. Mark's, P'Archahe, and Jeremie.

ART. 2. Every armed vessel, having a commission from either of the said ports, shall be reputed a pirate, and the said vessel and all its cargoes, shall be seized and carried into the nearest port of the United States.

ART. 3. The vessels and cargoes described in the 1st and 2d articles are declared good prize, and shall be sold for the benefit of the captors.

ART. 4. All vessels captured, which shall have cleared out under the vague denomination of West Indies, is comprehended in the 1st and 2d articles.

ART. 5. The decree of the 4th of last Nivose, in pursuance of the resolution of the executive directory, of the 14th Messidor, 4th year, shall be executed till further orders, as far as shall not be contravened by the present decree.
This decree shall be printed, transcribed in the register of the criminal and commercial tribunals, sent to all the French colonial ports, read, published, and posted up, wherever it may be necessary.

It shall be notified officially to the neutral Governments of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Bartholomew's.

Enjoining the criminal and commercial tribunals of Guadaloupe, their delegates in the different French colonies and elsewhere, the rear admiral commandant on the West India station, and the head of the administration, to aid in executing the present decree, each in his respective department.

Done at Basseterre, island of Guadaloupe, the 13th of Pluviose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

VICTOR HUGUES & LEBAS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial and petition of the subscribers, citizens of the United States, dwelling in Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists, and divers others, in the regular course of their trade, in the years 1793, 1794, and 1795, invested very large sums of money in provisions and other merchandises suited to the West India market, and sent them thither, where many cargoes were sold to the officers of colonial administration of the republic of France, to be paid for in cash or colonial produce; many others were taken by force by the said officers from the supercargoes and consignees, at prices arbitrarily fixed by themselves, to be paid for in produce at rates and terms of credit fixed at their pleasure and that others have been arrested on the high seas, carried into their ports, and taken for the use of the republic without any stipulated price or contract: that your memorialists confidently believe, that the amount of property belonging to the citizens of the United States, thus delivered to, and taken by, the administrative bodies of the French republic in the West Indies, exceeds two millions of dollars now in arrear, for which your memorialists and others concerned, have no mode of obtaining payment, satisfaction, or redress; that the usual course is, after taking the cargo by force and duress, to detain the vessels under pretence of paying in produce, until the masters and crew are wearied with sickness, delay, and insult, so as to be willing to return, either altogether without payment, or with such small portion thereof, as scarcely to pay the freight and charges occasioned by these long delays, whereby, in most instances, the whole capital has been left behind, and in those instances, where a considerable part of the cargo has been paid for in colonial produce, the expenses of demurrage have consumed almost the whole, as by vouchers ready to be laid before the House, or a committee thereof, will abundantly appear.

Your memorialist further show, that some of the earliest sufferers among them applied personally, and by memorials, to citizens Genet, Fauchet, and Adet, the first and succeeding ministers of the French republic, for redress, without obtaining it; they also applied, by memorial, to the President of the United States, who referred them to the Secretary for the Department of State, whose advice they pursued in committing their claims to James Monroe, Esq. minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the republic of France, at the time of his embarkation. That, although your memorialists are perfectly satisfied that the executive authority of the Union hath done all within its power to procure redress to your memorialists, yet it has not had the desired effect.

Your memorialists further represent, that they had hoped that some arrangement would have been assented to, whereby, the debts due from the republic of France to the citizens of America might have been discharged, out of the debt due to her from the United States, and, under this expectation, they exercised patience, but finding that money funded and transferred to an agent of the republic, all hope, from that resource, is vanished: your memorialists feel the more concern that, while provision has been made by the Executive of the Union for obtaining from other nations a redress for spoliations committed on their commerce, no measures hitherto adopted have been successful for procuring satisfaction from that nation, which the merchants of this city so delicately felt: to, by supplying their islands with provisions and necessaries, at a greater risk than attended any other branch of their trade, supplies that were absolutely necessary to their colonies, and which they could, from no other place, nor in any other manner, be furnished with.

Your memorialists therefore pray, that the Legislature will take their suffering case into consideration, and afford them such relief and protection as to their wisdom shall seem consistent with right and justice.

Mr. Livingston, from the committee appointed on the 29th December last, to inquire into the operation of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, and to report what amendments are necessary to be made thereto, made the following report:

That, from the neglect of the collectors of the different ports, to transmit the returns directed by the said act to the Secretary of State, it is difficult to present any precise result of the operation of the law to the House. For the quarter ending with the 30th of September, 1796, the collectors of the following ports only had made the return of impressments directed by the 7th section of the act aforesaid, viz: Providence, (Rhode Island) Washington, South Quay, Ipswich, Dighton, and Philadelphia.

For the succeeding quarter, ending the 31st of December, 1796, the returns were made on this subject only by the collectors of Philadelphia, Ipswich, Dighton, Providence, (Rhode Island) verbally by the collector of Boston.

It, however, appears, from the communication received from the Secretary of State, and annexed to this report, that affidavits have been transmitted to his office, taken, as well pursuant to the 5th section of the said act, as under the direction of a circular letter written from that department on the 29th of March last, and that from those documents there appear to have been impressed, by British ships of war and press-gangs, from on board American vessels, 114 seamen—

Of whom 51 are citizens of the United States, twenty-nine of whom whose States are particularly designated in the return, 12 natives of Great Britain or Ireland.

19 foreigners, natives of other countries than Great-Britain or Ireland.
29 whose citizenship is uncertain.

Total, 114

The same neglect of the collectors, to make the proper returns, has prevented your committee from procuring and submitting to the House an accurate statement of the number of seamen reenrolled pursuant to the 4th section of the said act. It appears however, that, in the two quarters preceding the 1st of January, 1797, there were registered by the several collectors who have completed their returns, the number of 4,891 seamen—

Of whom 4,333 are native Americans.
304 citizens by residence prior to the 3d of September, 1783.
41 naturalized citizens.

Total, 4,892

As to the operation of part of the law, directing the appointment of agents to reside in foreign ports, your committee report that no regular returns have been received from the said agents of the number of impressed seamen they have been able to discharge; but they understand, generally, that the law has operated beneficially in this respect.

Your committee also further report, that they have examined the suggestions contained in the letter annexed to the report from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the allowance to sick, disabled, or needy American seamen, in foreign ports; and are of opinion that some further legislative provision is necessary for their support; and, as connected with that subject, that some provision is necessary for the relief and support of such disabled or invalid seamen as may arrive at the different ports of the United States.

The committee find that numbers of seamen, as well foreigners as natives, arriving at the different ports of the United States, in such disabled situation, either become a great burden to the public hospitals, where any such are established, or are left to perish for want of proper attention.

They are of opinion that a sufficient fund might be raised for the support and relief of sick or disabled American seamen, as well in foreign ports as in the United States; either by an additional tonnage duty on all vessels entering the ports of the United States, or by a charge on the wages of all seamen shipped within the United States, proportioned to the length of the voyage, to be paid or secured by the master, and deducted from the wages of his crew.

The committee, therefore, in relation to the several objects above specified, recommend the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House, at its next meeting, an abstract of all the returns which shall then have been made to him, by the collectors of the different ports, pursuant to the directions of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen; and also such communications from the agents employed by virtue of the said act, in foreign ports, as may then be received.

Resolved, That, instead of the allowance directed to be made by the act, "concerning consuls and vice-consuls," for the relief and support of American seamen in foreign ports, provision ought to be made, by law, for allowing the sum of fifty cents per day, to each man, and for defraying the expense of transporting sick or disabled seamen to the United States.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for collecting the sum of —— cents, per month, from the wages of every seaman sailing from any port of the United States, to be appropriated—

1. To the temporary support and relief of sick or disabled seamen of the United States;
2. To the foundation of hospitals for the relief of such sick or disabled seamen, (when a sufficient fund shall be collected.)

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose, agreeably to your request, a copy, marked A,* of the instructions prescribed by the President of the United States, relative to the proofs of citizenship, and mode of taking the same, to entitle the applicants to be registered as American seamen. An abstract, marked B, of the returns received from different collectors, of the seamen they have registered pursuant to the act of Congress. The committee will observe, that a number of the collectors have made no returns. A statement, marked C, of seamen impressed or detained by foreign Powers, extracted from the returns of the collectors. Copies, marked D, and DD, of returns of impressments, from the collector of Pennsylvania; and an account, marked E, of such protests as have been transmitted to my office, relative to impressed seamen, as well in pursuance of the fifth section of the act for the relief and protection of our seamen, as in compliance with my request, in a circular letter sent to the collectors, in March, 1796. The dates of the protests, compared with the date of the President's instructions, transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors, will indicate what protests have been returned pursuant to the act of Congress.

I have no particular information to communicate on the operation of the act in question, having heard no complaints of difficulties or inconveniences in executing it. But, in other respects, our seamen need more effectual protection and support.

By the consular act, every master of an American vessel is required to receive and bring home, at least two of our seamen whom he may find in foreign ports, for every hundred tons burden of his vessel, without compensation other than the service of the seamen, on their passage, if able to work; and if he refuses to receive them, the consul of the place is authorized to prosecute him for a penalty of thirty dollars, in any court of competent jurisdiction, for every seaman so refused. Now, if the master wants seamen, he will gladly ship them as part of his crew; if he is full manned, to receive them will be inconvenient to him, or, at least, a burthen on his owners; and, in such cases, the master will contrive to evade the law, and our seamen will suffer, if not be lost to their country. Besides, in many foreign ports we have no consuls, and the penalty mentioned is incurred only when the master refuses to receive the seamen on the request or order of the consul. And in what courts are our consuls, resident in foreign countries, to prosecute the delinquents? I have asked the Attorney General's opinion. He answers: in the courts of the United States. The provision for such prosecutions may then, be considered as a nullity.

Why should not compensation be given to encourage the bringing home of destitute seamen? A very small duty on every vessel, or on every seaman, (as formerly they were taxed for the support of Greenwich hospital) would furnish an adequate fund.

The consular act also authorizes our consuls to support our needy or sick seamen in foreign ports, but restricts the allowance to twelve cents a day, a sum that in few ports in Europe would procure them a single meal; and, as to the sick, they must be left to perish, unless the consuls, at their own expense, provide clothing, nurses, and physicians. And who is to bury the dead? Funeral expenses, in many places, are considerable.

Our consuls have been in the practice of giving certificates to protect our seamen from impressments. These certificates have formerly been respected, with some exceptions. Lord Grenville has complained to Mr. King of numerous abuses by such protections being given to British subjects. It is highly probable that some abuses have taken place; yet, as seamen sometimes lose their protections, it seems necessary that the consuls should continue to give them. The consuls of other nations do the same, and the difference of language is a guard against frauds. Preventing a vessel from entering the port, and preventing his being impressed, would be a more effectual protection, than by bringing the consular acts into discred it, will destroy their usefulness. The fee taken by the consuls, (some few, I believe, issue the certificates gratis) is two dollars for each protection. This seems too burdensome on the seamen; and if, after all, carelessness, or other fault in some consuls in issuing certificates, should destroy the faith which ought to be given to the consular seal, the evil will be greatly increased.

These hints, written at your request, I submit to the consideration of the committee,

And am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Esq. Chairman of the Committee of the House of Representatives, on the act for the relief and protection of American seamen.

C.

A Statement of Seamen belonging to ships and vessels of the United States, impressed or detained by foreign Powers, taken from the returns of the Collectors of the Customs, to the Secretary of State, for the quarter ending the 30th September, 1796, in pursuance of the seventh section of the "act for the relief and protection of American Seamen."

Return of the collector of Providence, Rhode Island: That Benjamin Philips, master of the ship Rebecca, of Providence, who entered, on the 17th September last, from the Havanna, had two of his seamen impressed on his passage thence.

Return of the collector of Washington: That there were none.

Return of the collector of South Quay: That there were none.

Return of the collector of Ipswich: That there were none.

Return of the collector of Dighton: That there were none.

The foregoing are all the returns yet received relative to impressments and detentions, for the quarter aforesaid, except that from Pennsylvania district, a copy of which is annexed marked D.

On the 39th of last March, and previous to the passing of the act above mentioned, the Secretary of State had addressed a circular letter to the collectors of the principal ports in the United States, requesting them to take and transmit to him affidavits relative to impressments, and other outrages committed on citizens of the United States, by British ships of war. From this they had continued, without much precision, whether the affidavits transmitted were pursuant to the act of Congress, or the circular letter; and as returns of registered seamen have been made by many collectors who do not, at the same time, notice the impressments and detentions which may have taken place, it is probable that they considered the transmission of the affidavits themselves, as superseding the necessity of a formal return. An account of these affidavits or protests, as far as they come within the meaning of the act, will be found in the paper marked E.

A Statement of Seamen belonging to ships and vessels of the United States, impressed or detained by foreign Powers, taken from the returns of Collectors of the Customs, to the Secretary of State, for the quarter ending with the 31st December, 1796, in pursuance of the seventh section of the "act for the relief and protection of American Seamen."

The collector of Ipswich: That there were none.

The collector of Dighton: That there were none.

The collector of Providence, Rhode Island: That one seaman had been impressed from on board the brigantine Bethy, of Providence, Zachariah Rhodes, master, on the 4th August, 1796, at Port-au-Prince, by the British ship of Indostan, captain Bowier; but he was afterwards restored.

The collector of Boston reported personally to the Secretary of State: That, in his district, he had received no information of the impressment of a single seaman.

The return of the collector of Pennsylvania is annexed, marked DD.
COPY OF THE RETURN OF IMPRESSMENTS, MADE BY THE COLLECTOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

2. Affidavit of Robert Stanley, master of the schooner Adelaide, of Baltimore, dated Baltimore, 1st June, 1796. On a voyage from Jacmel, the said schooner was captured by the British ship of war Argonaut, Captain Ball, and sent to Jamaica. On making the capture, all the men were taken out of the schooner, but restored at Jamaica. Whilst she continued at Jamaica, Lemuel Brown and Joseph Richards, both natives, and William Jones, a citizen of the United States, were impressed by the British ship of war Jamaica, Captain Bingham. But they were afterwards restored.
